The plaintiffs' case depended on oral evidence, one document, Exhibit B, and the presumption that as the kanni was in existence in 1888, it must have been in use from then onwards. On the oral evidence, the lower Appellate Court was entitled to form and, as, already observed, did form its opinion, which is final. It no doubt has not referred separately to the evidence of the existence of remnants of a masonry structure on the ground in 1906; but that evidence was indefinite and there is no reason for doubting that it was considered. As regards Exhibit B, there was ground, referred to in the judgment, on which the lower Appellate Court could treat the mention of a kanni in it as open to suspicion. It is urged that there was no evidence to support the conjectural explanation that it was mentioned through the connivance of the Village Officers. But there was such evidence in the statement of 2nd plaintiff that 1st plaintiff was a District Board member, a Municipal Councillor and owner of large property, and, therefore, a person whom the Village Officers might be ready to oblige, and in the evidence (Exhibit G,) that the Village Munsif concerned, plaintiffs' witness No. 6, has undergone punishment in consequence of his partiality for plaintiffs in this affair. As regards the lower Appellate Court's refusal to make the presumption proposed, it was for it to estimate the reasons for and against doing so, and it has been shown that clear reason was available on plaintiffs' side, which it neglected. The further facts, which it detailed, the absence of reference to the kanni in accounts, in which it would naturally have been referred to, and the indirect character of plaintiffs' attempts to assert their right, when it was disputed, ending in their obtaining a recognition of the existence of a sluice for the kanni from a Public Works subordinate with authority to give it, were legitimate grounds of decision. The suggestion here that the mention of Mylam as the source of plaintiffs' irrigation in the accounts in question, Exhibit XIV, does not negative plaintiffs' right to the kanni, because it, in fact, brought water into Mylam, is unsound, because Exhibit XIV specifies not only the channel, but also the irrigation system, which serves each field and does not specify against plaintiffs' fields the Vikramanar system to which Mangudi belongs. In these circumstances it cannot be said that the lower Appellate Court has failed to consider plaintiffs' case or considered it on erroneous principles. Its finding that they did not prove an open, peaceful and uninterrupted user from 1888 is one of fact, to which no valid objection has been made good and it must, therefore, be accepted. It entails that plaintiffs have established no prescriptive right.

Argument was attempted also with reference to the period of user, which plaintiffs were bound to prove, the assumption in the lower Courts having apparently been that sixty years were required. Here it is suggested first that twelve years would be sufficient because plaintiffs' masonry sluice, above referred to, stood on Government land the border of the Mangudi channel, not on their field and they are in fact claiming a declaration of their right to possession of its site, but this is unsustainable since their plaint contained no such allegations or prayer. They argue next that (1) they are bound to prove user for twenty years only, the necessary period against a private party, not sixty, and (2) if sixty years is the period, they have proved a user for a sufficient portion of it, to transfer the burden of proof in respect of the remainder. As regards (1) they rely on the Secretary of State for India v. Kota Bapanamma Garu (1). But that was a suit for possession of land, and it was held only that the sixty years' period under Article 149 of Schedule I of the Indian Limitation Act, applied to suits by the Secretary of State not to suits against him. That decision does not affect the duty of plaintiffs here to prove sixty years' user which is imposed by the last clause of section 15 of the Indian Easements Act. With reference to the transfer of the burden of proof Sri Rajah Chetikani Rama Rau v. Secretary of State for India (2), Krishna Iyar v. Secretary of State for India (3) and Venkatarama Iyer v. Secretary of State for India (4) are relied on. But those cases related to possession and are not in point; and here, even if plaintiffs' continuous enjoyment as of right had been established for the period from 1888 to 1907, the date (as appears from Exhibit IX) of the Deputy Collector's order, referred to in the plaint as forbidding it, plaintiffs' argument would still be untenable, since they would not have completed the period of prescription necessary against a private individual. It is then maintained that the burden of proof of a shorter period of enjoyment than that necessary for complete prescription, with reference to Ponnusawmi Taver v. Collector of Madura (5) and Rajrup Koer v. Abul Hossein (6), was on the defendants. But in them the prescription of a lost grant was the basis of the decision, and here that prescription is negatived by the absence of reference to any grant or its recognition in the records, where it would naturally occur, Exhibits XV, XIV and XVI. There is, therefore, no reason for dissent from the lower Appellate Court's decision on this ground. The remaining grounds of appeal argued relate to the exclusion of evidence by the District Munsif. The first complaint is that the Supervisor, who gave the permission, Exhibit I, for the re-building plaintiffs' sluices was not examined. The facts alleged are that he attended the Court on several occasions, that eventually for one hearing he could not attend as he was ill, and that plaintiffs then on 8th September 1911, applied for an adjournment to secure his evidence. On that day defendants had closed their case, after examining witnesses. Plaintiffs had closed theirs on 18th August 1911, so far as appears, without any reservation regarding the Supervisor and without insisting on his examination. In these circumstances the District Munsif was right in refusing to adjourn at the stage, at which he was asked to do.

The other point taken is of wider importance and is not covered by Indian authority. It is that the District Munsif should have insisted on the production of a report by the Supervisor made to the Sub-Divisional Officer after inspection of the spot, which plaintiffs summoned and in respect of which 10th defendant, the Secretary of State, claimed privilege under sections 123, 124 and 162 of the Indian Evidence Act, the Chief Engineer stating that public interests would suffer by its production. The District Munsif allowed the objection, when it was made at the hearing for production of documents, with reference to section 124 of the Indian Evidence Act. Before evidence was taken, the High Court refused to interfere with this ruling by way of revision in Nagaraja Pillai v. Vythinatha Iyer (7). The Court declined to say that the District Munsif erred in holding "that the communication in question being from a subordinate officer, was prima facie of a confidential nature." It observed that the petitioners, the plaintiffs, had not asked the District Munsif to take evidence on the point and that the latter's refusal to inspect the document in order to decide was not shown to have been a wrong exercise of his discretion. On this plaintiffs contend that (1) this Court's order left the question, whether evidence should be taken, open and the District Munsif erred in disallowing the examination of plaintiffs' witness No. 14 as to the confidential nature of the document and (2) the document, not being in fact a communication in official confidence, contemplated by section 124, should have been exhibited, contra, reliance is placed on section 167 of the Indian Evidence Act.

The effect of this Court's order can be dealt with shortly. It certainly did not amount to a direction or authorisation to the District Munsif to take evidence and it contained nothing repugnant to the conclusion, which has been pressed on us, that, if plaintiffs had wanted to adduce evidence, they should have asked leave to do so, when documents were being received and before the order refusing to receive the document now in question was passed. It is, moreover, not alleged that any notice was given to 10th defendant of the renewal of the attempt to get it exhibited during the trial, and in the absence of any, that attempt was open to grave objection. And further, even if the claim to raise the question on evidence was not made irregularly, it is contended that the District Munsif was not bound to take any, if he could decide without it, as his order of the 5th August 1910 shows that he did, that the document was a communication in official confidence. Whether that decision was well-founded is the question raised by plaintiffs' second contention.

The Indian Law as to Government privilege is contained in sections 123, 124 and 162 of the Indian Evidence Act. Of these, section 124 above is relied on here and need be considered, plaintiffs' contention regarding it being that the words "communications in official confidence" mean and include only what in official parlance are known as confidential communications, that is, communications which in virtue of some special mark on them or some special direction by their author are to be kept with particular secrecy, and do not include official communications generally, to which only the reticence, expected by every employer of his servants, is applicable. There are, it is contended, two categories, ordinary official communications and communications in official confidence; and it is only to the second that section 124 should be applied, the report now in question belonging to the first.

Plaintiffs have given no valid reason for this interpretation of the section in the shape of authority or otherwise. For in Beatson v. Skene(8)the existence of any general rule that "all public documents, including communication to heads of departments, are to be produced and made public, whenever a suitor thinks that his case requires such production", is negatived. On the other hand, it does not appear that their contention represents either certainty or convenience. It is clear that the dominant intention in the section is to prevent disclosures to the detriment of the public interests; and it is settled in this Presidency by Venkatachella Chettiar v. Sampathu Chettiar (9) that the decision as to such detriment is to lie with the officer, to whom the communication is made. It is then impossible to reconcile the plaintiffs' interpretation with these two conclusions. For, that interpretation would make the conduct of the author of the communication, his giving or failing to give (perhaps through caprice or negligence) an indication of its confidential character, decisive and enable it to prevail over the opinion of the recipient on the really important point, the effect of the disclosure on public interest. It would be wrong to sacrifice the two definite conclusions reached as to one portion of the section to a doubtful construction of the remainder. That construction, moreover, is not required by the wording. For, it rests on the special use of the word "confidential" in official parlance, which there is no reason for assuming that the Legislature had in mind. An easier and more probable explanation of the phrase "official confidence" is afforded by comparison with the references to "professional confidence" in connection with the privilege of legal advisers, as for instance, at Ameer Ali and Woodroff's "Law of Evidence", 1st Edition, page 794, Taylor on Evidence, 10th Edition, page 650, and in Goodall v. Little (10) and Ex parte Campbell, In re Cathcart (11) quoted in Framji Bhicaji v. Mohansingh Dhansing (12). It is true that a pledge of secrecy is referred to in the case last decided. But that reference in no way affects the utility of the comparison for the present purpose or provides an analogy supporting the plaintiffs' argument; for such a pledge is mentioned as material with reference to preliminary and collateral matters, which are outside the general privilege and have no resemblance to the report at present in question. In these circumstances, consideration of the section and of the consequences of the interpretation for which the plaintiffs contend, lead to the conclusion that the words "communication in official confidence" import no special degree of secrecy and no pledge or direction for its maintenance, but include generally all matters communicated by one officer to another in the performance of their duties. The question whether such communication was made in the course of such performance, is for the Court to decide.

This view is at least consistent with the decisions. The order of this Court (already referred to) in the revision petition in the present case does treat the District Munsif's ruling as being that the report was a "communication of a confidential nature." But it does not appear that the plaintiffs' present contention was put forward, if at all, with any fulness; and it was not necessary, if it was, to deal with it in order to dispose of the petitions. In Venkatachella Chettiar v. Sampathu Chettiar (9), already referred to, section 124 was considered with reference to income tax returns made to a Government office. As the Court held that there was no basis for the plea that confidence of any kind was in question and that the Income Tax Act and rules justified none, the decision is inapplicable to the case of a report by one officer to another. The English cases must be applied with caution, because, they do not statedly distinguish between the principles embodied in sections 124 and 163 of the Indian Evidence Act. Reference may, therefore, be limited to those, in which the necessity for a preliminary decision by the Court as to the official character of the communication in question might have arisen. The decision, it will be found, did not turn on the degree of confidence involved or on the existence of any specially prescribed confidence between those concerned. Thus in Stace v. Griffith (13) there is nothing in the report to indicate that any special plea as to the confidential character of the communication was considered and the issue is stated as being only whether it was official. So also in Beatson v. Skene (8) already referred to.

In Hughes v. Vargas (14) there was nothing to show that the document under discussion was confidential in any special sense, in fact, it appears from the report to have been seen by the clerks in the public office concerned; and again the judgment is based not on that or any other fact bearing on the degree of confidence between the writer and recipient, but on the injury to public interest, certified to be involved. The result of the argument from authority is no doubt merely negative. But it is consistent with the decision already reached directly. The decision must, therefore, be that the District Munsif was right in refusing to insist on the Supervisor's report being produced.

It is also urged with reference to section 167, Indian Evidence Act, that the report would not have varied the decision if produced and, therefore, cannot be ground for ordering a new trial. We have not been told what matter of importance to plaintiffs the report is expected to contain or that it contains anything except the results of the Supervisor's inspection of the spot about two years, after the dispute began; and I should, therefore, if necessary, be inclined to refuse to interfere on this ground also.

I would dismiss the second appeals with costs.

TYABJI, J.—I have had the benefit of reading my learned brother's judgment. The plaintiffs' suit is in effect for a declaration that they are entitled to conduct water from the Mangudi channel (which has its source in the Vikramanar river) to the Mylam Kanni (a channel forming part of the Cauvery irrigation system) by a conduit called the Mudavan Kanni; and the plaintiffs ask for an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with the conduit.

The right claimed is an easement falling within section 4, illustration (c) of the Indian Easements Act. The Mangudi channel takes the place of "B's stream," in the illustration, and the "fountains in the garden attached to the house" are here re-placed by the Mylam channel which has been found to be the source of irrigation to which the plaintiffs are entitled as the owners of the lands referred to in the plaint.

The District Munsif held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the reliefs claimed and decreed accordingly and his decision was reversed in appeal. We have now to decide whether the lower Appellate Court's decision is vitiated by any such error as requires our interference in second appeal.

The first point determined by the lower Appellate Court, is that the plaintiffs' recognised source of irrigation is the Mylam channel. This merely reduces the plaintiffs' case more definitely to the basis I have mentioned: a right that might have been claimed independently of an easement acquired by prescription is found not to inhere in the plaintiff. Their rights, therefore, could only be under an easement acquired by prescription.

For this purpose, it was necessary to determine the point of time, since when the right has been claimed as an easement and has been peaceably and openly enjoyed by the plaintiffs claiming title thereto as an easement, and as of right, without interruption. If the period during which the right has been so claimed and enjoyed is not less than sixty years it has become absolute and the plaintiffs must succeed (the Indian Easements Act, section 15, paragraphs Nos. 3 and 4 and last paragraph).

The Subordinate Judge has found that the conduit in question existed in 1888, and it must have come into existence a little before that, but that it has not been proved that the right to have the conduit has been exercised openly, peacefully or uninterruptedly.

This finding is conclusive against the plaintiffs. It has, however, been attacked on several grounds which may be dealt with under three heads.

First, it was argued that the Subordinate Judge did not consider or did not appreciate for himself the oral evidence but mistook the District Munsif's appreciation of it and adopted the view which he mistakenly considered to be that of the District Munsif. This argument is supported merely by seizing hold of an isolated sentence in the Subordinate Judge's judgment, paragraph No. 11. It seems to me that he appreciated the oral evidence for himself and found an independent opinion opposed to that of the District Munsif.

The next argument has reference to the presumptions of fact which the learned Subordinate Judge (it is contended) disregarded. There was evidence, however, on both sides, and to the arguments adduced before us under this head the remarks from Bowen, L. J.'s judgment set out in Hall v. Venkatakrishna (15) are a sufficient answer. To accede to the arguments of the appellants would be to decide in second appeals questions of fact by purporting to lay down on whom the burden of proof lay in a given state of facts or evidence. The question which a Court sitting in second appeal has to decide is thus stated by Lord Kinnear in Folkestone Corporation v. Brockman (16). The question seems to be whether it was still open to the tribunal to draw a further inference of fact one way or the other, or whether the necessary conclusion was already fixed by a rule of law. The question before the House of Lords then was whether the fact of dedication to the public of a highway had been proved, Lord Kennear points out the difference in the words of Parke, B., between "conclusive evidence" and "evidence on which those who have to find that fact may find that there was a dedication by the owner." "I think," he says later, "it is fallacious to assume dedication on a partial view of the evidence, and only after that has been done to inquire whether conflicting facts are strong enough to dislodge a conclusion already reached," (page 354). "The question is one of fact, turning upon probabilities of conduct, which cannot be estimated by antecedent rules of law" (page 356). "If the strength of the presumption can be increased or diminished according to circumstances, it is for the jury to determine the weight which should be given to it in any particular case" (page 357). The course of proceeding which the Court of Appeal followed in the case, and which Lord Kinnear described as fallacious is thus referred to by Lord Dunedin: "They fasten upon certain of the series of separable conclusions in fact which the Justices set out. These findings, say they, amount to a finding of user by the public. User by the public raises a presumption of dedication, and in the other facts found by the Justices. There is nothing sufficient to rebut the presumption" (pages 374 and 375).

(15) 13 M. 394.
(16) (1914) A. C. 338 at p. 349; 83 L. J. K. B. 745.

"With reference to the learned Judges, I do not think that is the proper way to approach the question, and its defect, to my mind, consists in regarding 'user' as an inflexible term, which, if found to apply, can lead to only one legal result. User is evidence, and can be no more, of dedication. The expression that user raises a presumption of dedication has its origin in this, that in cases where express dedication is out of the question no one can see into a man's mind, and, therefore, dedication, which can never come into being without intention, can, if it is to be proved at all, only be inferred or presumed from extraneous facts. But that still leaves as matter for inquiry what was the user, and to what did it point. And this must be considered, not after the method of the Horatii and Curiatii, by taking a set of isolated findings, saying that they presumably lead to ascertain result, and then proceeding to see if that presumption can be rebutted, but by considering the whole facts, the surroundings which lead to the user, and from all those facts, including the user, coming to the conclusion whether or not the user did infer dedication" (page 375). He concludes, "unless the evidence points all one way," "in the long run it all comes to this: Which is the more probable alternative?" (page 377).

It seems to me that for similar reasons, and as sitting in this Court, I have no jurisdiction to consider questions of fact, it is beyond my province to consider whether in appreciating or weighing the evidence, the lower Appellate Court has applied the presumptions referred to in Sri Rajah Chetikani Rama Rau v. Secretary of State for India (2); Krishna Iyer v. Secretary of State for India (3) and Venkatarama Iyer v. Secretary of State for India and Secretary of State for India v. Kota Bapanamma Garu (1) and Ponnuswami Taver v. Collector of Madura (5) in the same manner as I should have done if I had to adjudicate upon the facts, I have no jurisdiction to appreciate for myself the weight to be given to the circumstances on the one side and the other. The Legislature has given to the lower Appellate Court the right to pronounce finally on these questions.

In the cases relied upon by the appellants, adverse possession for 20 years or more against the Government had been proved, and the Government had not been able to show that any title in themselves subsisted. In the present case, however, the lower Appellate Court has considered the appellants' evidence insufficient to prove that the easement has ever been enjoyed openly, peaceably and uninterruptedly. The appellants desire us to fasten upon one piece of evidence and "after the manner of the Horatii and the Curiatii" to challenge the Government to bring forward any piece of rebutting evidence.

Lastly, it was argued that the lower Appellate Court wrongly excluded evidence sought to be adduced by the appellants. The learned Vakil for the appellants can, however, give us very few particulars about the document alleged to be improperly rejected, and as to the effect it would have on the evidence. It appears that it is a report made on 31st August 1908, and when pressed the learned Vakil, for the appellants, could only say that it might possibly point to there being earlier records which might be discovered, by the clue so obtained and which might turn out in favour of the appellants. Section 167 of the Indian Evidence Act precludes interference by a Court of Appeal on such hypothetical grounds. It is unnecessary, therefore, to deal with the question whether any evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs to show that the document was not a communication made in official confidence, was improperly rejected. But I entirely agree with my learned brother that the question whether or not a communication is made in official confidence cannot depend solely on the question whether it is marked "confidential."

I agree, therefore, that the second appeals should be dismissed with costs.

Mr. M. L. Agarwala, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit in which the plaintiffs sought a declaration that a certain lease and kabuliat were not binding upon him on the ground that they had been granted by a karinda who had no authority. The material facts are as follows:—The plaintiff sued in the first instance in the Revenue Court to eject the defendant-appellant. The allegation was that the defendant was a non-occupancy tenant from year to year. The defendant set up the lease and kabuliat. The plaintiff replied that the lease was given without authority. The Revenue Court went into the matter and decided that there was authority to create the tenancy and accordingly dismissed the plaintiff's suit. Thereupon the plaintiff instituted the present suit, claiming the relief we have already mentioned. It is argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the present suit could not have been brought in the Revenue Court and that, therefore, the matter cannot be said to be res judicata. On the other hand the defendant relies on sections 95 and 167 of the Tenancy Act, II of 1901. Section 95 provides that suits can be brought either by the tenant or the landholder for a declaration of various matters connected with the tenancy and amongst others for a declaration as to the class to which the tenant belongs. The section 167 is as follows :—"All suits and applications of the nature specified in the fourth Schedule shall be heard and determined by the Revenue Courts and except in the way of appeal as hereinafter provided no Court other than a Revenue Court shall take cognisance of any dispute or matter in respect of which any such suit or application might be brought or made."

The defendant contends that the plaintiffs might have sued under the provisions of section 95 for a declaration that the defendant was a non-occupancy tenant and that in such a suit it would have been competent for the Revenue Court to have taken into consideration the question of the validity or invalidity of the lease. The defendant further contends that the real 'dispute' between the plaintiffs and the defendant was whether or not the defendant was liable to be ejected from his holding on the ground that he was a tenant from year to year, and that this is one of the suits or matters referred to in section 167.

It is necessary for a moment to consider what is the real relief which the plaintiffs seek. It is clear that what they want is to eject the defendant from his holding. The declaration of the Civil Court on the question of the validity or invalidity of the lease would be quite useless except for the purpose of obtaining possession of the holding from the defendant. It is quite true that if we regard the form of the suit and disregard the substance of the dispute between the parties, the present suit is not a suit which could have been instituted in the Revenue Court. But the real substance of the matter is clearly a matter which could have been, and was decided in the Revenue Court. It cannot be denied for one moment that the present suit is an attempt to get behind the decision of the Revenue Court. We think that the real test of the matter is whether or not the Revenue Court in a suit for ejectment was competent to go into the question of the validity or invalidity of the lease. We can see no reason whatever why it should not do so: if the lease was granted by a person who had no authority to make it, it was simply a piece of waste paper and had no more validity than if it had been forged. In our opinion it is impossible to argue that the Revenue Court in the proceedings before it, was not entitled to go into the question of the validity or invalidity of the lease.

The learned Advocate on behalf of the respondents cited the case of Gomti Kunwar v. Gudri (1). This case is no authority for the proposition that where in the Revenue Court in a suit for ejectment the defendant pleads that he holds under a lease, it is not competent for the Revenue Court to consider the question of the validity of the lease. The only matter that was decided in that case was whether or not the decision of the Revenue Court operated as res judicata in a subsequent proceeding in the Civil Court. The Court held that the matter was not res judicata on the ground that the Revenue Court could not have tried the subsequent suit. In that case, (which was no doubt somewhat similar to the case now before us), the provisions of sections 95 and 167 of the Tenancy Act were not referred to or considered.

In the case of Rai Krishna Chand v. Mahadeo Singh (2), the principle which we think ought to apply to the present case is stated in the following words:—"If the second and third defendants executed, in favour of the first defendant, he being a non-occupancy tenant, a lease which they had no power to execute on the landholder's behalf, the proper course for the plaintiff to adopt was to take proper proceedings under the North-Western Provinces Rent Act, 1881, for the ejectment of the tenant, ignoring the lease, and if the lease was set up in defence, showing that under the circumstances of its execution it was not binding upon him. As that course might have been adopted the provisions of section 95 of the Rent Act apply and the Civil Court could not entertain the suit so far as the setting aside of the lease was concerned."

We accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of this Court and also of both the lower Courts and dismiss the plaintiffs' suit with costs in all Courts, including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), ss. 3 (2), 151, 179—Part of an estate, also an estate—Owner—Landholder—Jurisdiction of Revenue Courts.

The Estates Land Act is not intended to be confined in its operation only to estates in their entirety which fall under one of the five clauses of section 3 (2). Parts of an estate are also within the scope of the Act. Where the tenants of a part of an estate set up occupancy rights in defence to an action in ejectment by the landholder, Revenue Courts alone have jurisdiction.

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Vizagapatam, in Original Suit No. 69 of 1910.

Mr. V. Rama Doss, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, OFFG. C.J.—For the purposes of our decision the facts in Appeal Suit No. 277 of 1911 and Second Appeals Nos. 1508 to 1510 of 1912 may be considered to be the same. Both were suits in ejectment brought by the alienees of part of a village in the Uratla Estate, and the question is whether the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts is not barred under the provisions of the Madras Estates Land Act. The Uratla Estate is admittedly an estate within the meaning of the definition in section 3 (2) of the Act, while the portion of a village alienated to the plaintiffs does not itself form an estate within the meaning of the Act as it does not come within any of the descriptions in sub clauses (a) to (c). The District Munsif and District Judge in the one case and the Subordinate Judge in the others are all agreed on this point, and are so far clearly right. They have, however, drawn the inference that because the land alienated to the plaintiffs does not itself form an estate within the definition, it is outside the general scope of the Act, and the provisions barring the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts in suits for ejectment are inapplicable. This view is opposed to several unreported decisions of this Court to which we have been referred, but as it has been held by all three Judges of the lower Court it may be as well to deal with the question on the merits. Though the plaintiff is not the owner of an estate, he is clearly the owner of part of an estate and as such a landholder within the definition, in section 3 (6); his tenants are ryots within the meaning of section 3 (15) and pay rent within the meaning of section 3 (11). As a landholder he may sue for ejectment before the Collector under section 151, and the right of the Civil Court to entertain such suits is barred under section 179, nor is there, as appears to have been imagined, anything inconsistent with the scheme of the Act in holding that the plaintiffs are landholders as owning part of the Uratla Estate although the portion which they own has been absolutely severed from the rest of the estate and the proprietor of the latter has no interest in it. As appears from the title and the preamble the general scope of the Act is to declare and amend the law relating to the holding of land in estates in the Presidency, that is, of course, in estates as defined in the Act to the exclusion of the large areas such as the ryotwari tracts which do not come within the definition. Again even in estate the general provisions of the Act are only applicable as between landholders and ryots as defined in the Act and do not apply to the relations between ryots in estates and thoss holding under them, except, of course, as expressly mentioned. In this state of things the Legislature was faced with the question whether estates as defined in the section which had become divided in ownership without being split into two or more estates should as between the several owner and the ryots under them be regulated by the general provisions of the Act, and it seems to me there were obvious reasons for so including them by providing that landholder should include a person owning part of an estate, that is of an area to which the general provisions of the Act were intended to apply. In any case the provisions of the Act are plain in my opinion and we are bound to give effect to them. The appeal and the second appeals are allowed and the decrees set aside; all the plaints will be returned for presentation to the proper Court. Costs to abide the result.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The plaintiff sues to eject the defendants from certain lands in the village of Mallavaram. It is conceded that geographically these lands are within Uratla, a permanently settled estate. It is also not disputed that they belonged originally to the proprietors of the Uratla Estate; they were given to one Subadriah Garu in exchange for certain maniam lands situated elsewhere. The plaintiff purchased these lands from the son of Subadriah Garu. His allegation is that the defendant had no occupancy right in these lands and that he is entitled to eject him. The defendant demurs to the jurisdiction of the Civil Court. He pleads that he is an occupancy ryot and is entitled to remain in possession. The learned District Judge held that he had jurisdiction to entertain the suit: and holding that defendant was liable to be evicted, gave a decree to the plaintiff. The defendant has appealed.

I am of opinion that the Civil Courts have no jurisdiction. It is admitted that the lands in suit were originally ryoti lands, and the evidence is clear and uncontradicted that at the time of the exchange they continued to be ryoti. It is not necessary for the purpose of deciding the question of jurisdiction to determine whether both the warams vested in Subadriah Garu or only the melvaram: I do not think that the fact that the exchanged lands were inams has any bearing upon the question we have to decide. Our opinion in regard to them must depend upon their own character and not upon that of the property for which they were substituted.

The learned District Judge based his judgment mainly on the ground that Mallavaram is not an estate as defined in section 3 (2) of the Estates Land Act and consequently the provisions of the Act do not apply to lands in that village; I am unable to agree with this view. It is clear that the Act was not intended to be confined in its operation only to estates in their entirety which fell under one of the five clauses of section 3 (2): I do not think it is open to us to attribute an intention to the Legislature which is inconsistent with the operative portions of the Act. Section 200 of the Act makes it clear that parts of an estate are within the Act. On principle, it seems clear that all lands in a permanently settled estate are to have the benefit of the Act, and the fact that a portion of the estate has been granted to a stranger should not make any difference in this behalf. In Second Appeal No. 1218 of 1911, it was held that the definition of 'estate' is not the governing factor in deciding the applicability of the Act. I am of the same opinion. Mr. Sarma's chief contention is that the word 'estate' used in clauses 2, 5, 15 and 16 of section 3 refers to one as it existed at the time of the Estates Land Act and not to one with limits ascribed to it at the time of the Permanent Settlement. As a corollary from this, he argues that portions of the parent estate which either by operation of law or by act of parties ceased to belong to the permanently settled estate are not within the ambit of the Act. No authority has been quoted for this proposition, nor can such a contention be upheld even on grounds of expediency. As a matter of fact, portions of estates granted subsequent to the Permanent Settlement are included for revenue purposes within the estate. Their liability to be attached for arrears of revenue continues and unless separated and separately registered the lands continue to be part of the estate. The definition of landholder (section 3 clause 5) places the matter beyond doubt. There can be more than one landholder within an estate and each will have all the powers given to that class by the Act. I feel no doubt that Mallavaram is within the Uratla Estate even though the proprietor of that estate is not the landholder in respect of the village, and that the plaintiff is a landholder. I have already held that the land in suit was ryoti land; and it follows from the above that the defendant is a ryot. I am not deciding whether he has got occupancy right in the land. He has put forward that claim and it is upon that assumption that the question of jurisdiction has to be determined. From my findings about the nature of the land, and the characters of the plaintiff and the defendant section 151 of the Estates Land Act applies to the case; and under Article 17 of the Schedule only Revenue Courts have jurisdiction. This conclusion of mine is in accordance with the decisions in Second Appeals Nos. 168 of 1912, 323 of 1913 and Sri Sri Sri Brundavana Chandra v. Pragada Rammayya (1). I agree that the appeal should be allowed and that the plaint should be returned to the plaintiff for presentation to the proper Court. In the second appeals also, the plaint will be returned for presentation to the proper Court.

Appeal allowed.

Landlord and tenant—Grove—Grove on sir land—Right of grove-holder—Ejectment.

The plaintiff, zemindar of a village, permitted the defendant to plant grove on a sir plot on the payment of a nominal rent. Subsequently the plaintiff's zemindari right was sold but the grove existed as before:

Held, that the defendant grove-holder could not be ejected from the grove at the instance of the plaintiff.

Second appeal from the decision of the Sub-Judge of Cawnpore, dated the 5th of September 1913.

Mr. Hamilton, for the Appellants.

Mr. Baldeo Ram, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a plaintiffs' appeal arising out of a suit in ejectment. The Court below has found the facts to be as follows. Sometime prior to the year 1887 the predecessor-in-title of the plaintiffs was the owner of certain zemindari plots, one of which was the grove land now in dispute. This was recorded as his sir, but with the sanction of this owner one Khushal Singh, uncle of Nathu Singh, planted a grove on the land and continued to pay a rent of Rs. 3-8. In 1887 Nathu Singh sold the grove to the predecessor-in-title of the present defendants and left the village. From that date up to the present time the defendants continued to hold the land on payment of a nominal rent of Rs. 3-8. Trees still stand upon it and still constitute a grove. The plaintiffs in the meantime had lost their zemindari and the land no longer belongs to them, although it is possible (if it were sir that when they lost their zemindari they acquired an ex-proprietary tenant right. They now sue to eject the defendants. In these circumstances the Courts below have refused to give the plaintiffs a decree for the ejectment of the defendants. It is a well-known custom in these provinces that when the owner of land allows another to plant trees and make a grove thereon the condition of the tenancy is that the land shall be held by the grove-holder so long as the trees constitute a grove and that when the trees are removed or the grove ceases to exist the land reverts to the land-holder. It certainly would be most inequitable in the circumstances of the present case to eject the defendants and to hand over the trees which they have grown upon the land to the plaintiffs without the breaking of any condition and merely at the will of the plaintiffs. Whatever may have been the right of the latter it is quite clear that a grove-holder has a right to continue holding the land so long as he fulfils the conditions on which the land is given. In my opinion the decision of the Court below is perfectly correct. The appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs, including fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), s. 3 (5)—Lessee from transferee of zemindar—Right to lease and cultivate—Estate-holder.

A person obtaining a lease of land with the right of leasing it to others as well as of cultivating it himself from a person who derives his right by transfer from the zemindar, is an estate-holder within the meaning of section 3 (5) of the Estates Land Act; Sivini Appalanarasimhulu v. Murada Sanyasi, 17 Ind. Cas. 210, followed.

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Cocoanada, in Small Cause Suit No. 938 of 1911.

Mr. P. Narayanamurthi, for the Petitioner.

Mr. B. Narasimha Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—We follow Sivini Appala narasimhulu v. Murada Sanyasi (1), and attach importance to the provision in paragraph 7 of Exhibit I for plaintiff's leasing the land to others as well as cultivating it himself. There is also the fact that the plaintiff's predecessor derived his right by transfer from the original owner, the zemindar on these considerations. We agree with the lower Court that the plaintiff is a landholder within the meaning of section 3 (5) of the Madras Estates Land Act and dismiss the civil revision petition with costs.

HEMENDRA PRASAD GHOSH—DEFENDANT.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 92 (2)—Promissory note silent as to interest—Contemporaneous oral agreement as to interest, whether provable.

Where a promissory-note is silent as to interest, evidence of a contemporaneous oral agreement as to the rate of interest, cannot be allowed under proviso (2) of section 92 of the Evidence Act as it would have the effect of materially adding to the terms of the written contract.

Sowdamonee Debya v. A. Spalding, 12 C. L. R. 163; Ghanshiam Lalji v. Ram Narain, 29 A. 33 (P. C.); 11 C. W. N. 105; 17 M. L. J. 35; 4 A. L. J. 29; 1 M. L. T. 427; 9 Bom. L. R. 1; 5 C. J. J. 7; 34 I. A. 6, referred to.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit upon a negotiable instrument. Though written on a hundi stamp and purporting to be accepted, the document is in form a promissory note for Rs. 1,100 payable sixty days after date. The promissory note is admitted by the defendant. The only question is as to interest. The promissory note is silent as to interest, but the plaintiff pleads that the rate of discount agreed between the parties at the time the said hundi was drawn was 5 per cent. per mensem, and it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that if the defendant should fail to pay the amount due on the said hundi as the same became due, he should pay interest on the amount so remaining due at the aforesaid rate of 5 per cent. per mensem. The defendant denies that he agreed to pay at the rate of 6 per cent. (it should be 5 per cent.) per mensem, but admits an agreement to pay at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. The only point for my determination is whether the plaintiff can be allowed to give evidence of the agreement which he alleges. I am of opinion that he cannot. It is true that in the case of Sowdamonee Debya v. A. Spalding (1), evidence of a subsequent agreement appears to have been allowed. That was a reference from the Small Cause Court and the point does not appear to have been argued. The case of Ghanshiam Lalji v. Ram Narain (2) has no application as the collateral agreement there was in writing, and the question was whether such an agreement was enforceable, by reason of the provisions of section 80 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881. In my opinion, evidence of the agreement now sought to be proved is excluded by the provisions of s. 92 of the Evidence Act. It is, as pleaded, a contemporaneous oral agreement which would have the effect of materially adding to the terms of the written contract. It cannot, I think, be allowed under proviso 2 to the section. It is true that the promissory note is silent as to interest, but that would be the case in most documents into which an additional stipulation is to be introduced. This too is a formal document, and it cannot be presumed that the parties intended to agree upon anything that was not inserted in it. It would, in my opinion, be very dangerous to allow evidence of such agreements, as the creditor would be thus enabled to adapt the rate of interest to the requirements of the case, and, when the debtor had once failed to pay, to enhance his claim accordingly.

The defendant admits the claim for interest at 12 per cent. per annum and this I think he must pay. There will be a decree for the plaintiff for Rs. 1,100 and interest on that amount at 12 per cent. per annum from the due date of the promissory-note till to-day, and costs on scale No. 2 and interest on judgment at 6 per cent. per annum.

Suit decreed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 26—Appellate Court, omission of, to fix time for filing objections to findings of lower Court—Irregularity, technical.

The omission of an Appellate Court to fix a time, as required by Order XLI, rule 26, Civil Procedure Code, within which either party may present a memorandum of objections to findings of the lower Court, is a mere technical irregularity and may be ignored if it does not in any way prejudice the party complaining of the same.

Babu Aditya Prasad, for the Appellant.

Mr. F. O. O'Neill, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is urged on the ground that when the Commissioner received the evidence on findings in the Court of first instance, he should under rule 26 of Order XLI have fixed a time within which either party might present a memorandum of objections. It is true that the Commissioner omitted to fix such a date, but the result is a purely technical irregularity and did not, in my opinion, prejudice the appellant. A very careful inquiry was made by the Court of first instance and a finding recorded, and this finding was considered by the Commissioner after hearing the Pleader for the appellant. I do not think that to order any further proceedings would serve any useful purpose whatsoever. The objection is purely technical and I see no reason to re-open the question decided and decided on grounds which admit of no doubt.

The appeal is dismissed with costs on the appellant.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 120—Hindu Law—Alienation by widow—Contest by remote reversioner—Cause of action—Limitation.

A suit for a declaration that an alienation made by a Hindu widow is not binding on the plaintiff, a remote reversioner, is governed by Article 120 of the Limitation Act.

The cause of action accrues on the date of alienation.

Second appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Farrukhabad, dated 3rd November 1913.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Appellant.

Dr. S. C. Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal by a plaintiff whose suit for a declaration has been dismissed by the lower Appellate Court as barred by limitation. Debi Das, father of the plaintiffs, had two brothers, Jwala Parshad and Prag Das; they lived separately. Jwala Parshad died childless, leaving a widow, Musammat Rukmani. This lady, while in possession of the property of her late husband with a Hindu widow's estate, executed a deed of sale on February 12th, 1898, transferring to certain persons, who appear as defendants Nos. 1 and 2 in the case, a house which had belonged to her late husband. By the present suit instituted on April 11th, 1913, the plaintiff sought a declaration that this sale-deed was ineffectual as against him and enforceable only during the life-time of Musammat Rukmani. He impleaded this lady as a defendant, and also his own father, Debi Das, and his uncle, Prag Das. Only the defendants-vendees contested the suit, no appearance being entered by any of the others. Ordinarily the plaintiff would not be permitted to maintain such a suit he not being the nearest reversioner to the estate of Jwala Parshad in the presence of his own father and uncle. The plaintiff accordingly pleaded that Prag Das had colluded with Musammat Rukmani and with the vendees at the time of the sale; with reference to Debi Das he pleaded that the latter had long since severed himself from all connection with mundane affairs and elected to reside in solitude in a certain garden. He claimed that a cause of action accrued to him on February 13th, 1910, the date on which a suit by his father or his uncle became barred by limitation under the provisions of Article 125 of the first Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908) and that his suit was within time under Article 120 of the same Schedule. It may be noted that the plaintiff gave his own age as thirty years in June or July 1913, so that he attained majority within three years of the execution of the sale-deed in question. There is, therefore, no question of any extension of period of limitation on the ground of the plaintiff's minority.

The learned Subordinate Judge has found clear authority, in certain decisions of the Madras High Court referred to in his judgment, for the proposition that the plaintiff's cause of action accrued to him on the date of the execution of the sale-deed of February 12th, 1898, and that the period of limitation for the same is that provided by Article 120 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act. He has not, therefore, thought it necessary to examine in any detail the precise pleadings in this particular case. Yet these are sufficient in themselves to make the plaintiff's position a very difficult one, even if the propositions of law contended for on his behalf are correct. So far as his uncle Prag Das is concerned, the plaintiff's allegation that a cause of action accrued to him on February 13th, 1910, will not bear a moment's examination. He says that Prag Das colluded with the vendor and vendees at the time of this sale, so that he had his cause of action complete on that date or at latest on the date on which the fact of Prag Das' collusion became known to him. As regards the plaintiff's father, the point may not be quite so clear because the facts have not been gone into. A comparison of the plaint and the written statement certainly suggests that the parties intended to plead, and did in fact plead, that Debi Das' withdrawal from all interest in worldly affairs took place prior to the execution of the contested sale-deed. The plaintiff uses the vague expression "long since," the defendants, while admitting the correctness of the paragraph in the plaint regarding Debi Das' withdrawal from the world, pleaded that the deed in suit had been executed with the knowledge and information of, and in consultation with, the plaintiff and his uncle, Prag Das. The fact that it would have been useless for the vendees to attempt to obtain the consent of Debi Das was presupposed by the pleadings and the frame of the issues. If this fact be admitted, it seems clear that the plaintiff, on his own showing had a complete cause of action the day on which he knew that Prag Das had wrongfully colluded with the vendor and vendees to execute the sale-deed in suit. Whether he had a valid cause of action, is of course, quite a different question and one as to which we express no opinion; it is enough to find that it was a cause of action which had become barred by time long before the institution of the present suit.

When the facts above noticed were brought out in the course of arguments before us, a strong appeal was made to us not to decide the matter on these grounds without remitting issues to the Courts below, the point taken being that neither of those Courts had considered the question of limitation in this particular light. We are not disposed to remit issues. It cannot be said that such a question as the date of the retirement of Debi Das from all interest in wordly affairs, or the precise nature of that retirement, was ever put in issue on the pleadings. The parties went to trial on the admission that this retirement took place so long ago that its precise date was quite immaterial and practically also on the admission that this retirement was so effective and complete that Debi Das had put himself in such a position that he could not be expected to do anything to protect the interests of his son from the nefarious schemes of the other defendants.

Apart from this, as the question of law involved was argued before us at length, we think it right to say that we are not prepared to accede to the proposition of law on which the plaintiff-appellant's case rests. In the case of an alienation by a Hindu widow the person or persons who would be entitled at any given moment to succeed to the estate of her late husband, have a cause of action from the date of the alienation and a right to sue under Article 125 of the first Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act within twelve years of the date of such alienation. The contention for the appellant is that their failure to do so within twelve years ipso facto creates a cause of action for the next reversioner or reversioners, which action may be brought within a further period of six years under Article 120 of the same Schedule. It would follow that the expiration of this period would create a fresh cause of action with a further period of limitation for the reversioner or reversioners one degree further removed and so on for the whole lifetime of the widow. No direct authority can be quoted for propositions so remarkable.

The principal cases referred to in argument may be noted below:—

Rani Anund Kunwar v. Court of Wards (1); Abinash Chandra Mozumdar v. Harinath Shaha (2); Jhula v. Kanta Prasad (3); Bhagwanta v. Sukhi (4 ; Ayyadorai Pillai v. Solai Ammal (5); Govinda Pillai v. Thayammal (6).

In the first of these their Lordships of the Privy Council were dealing with a suit to set aside an adoption, a suit for which a period of twelve years from the date of the adoption is specifically provided, by whomsoever the suit may be brought. It is certain, therefore, that when they spoke of some act or omission on the part of the nearest reversioner by which the latter disabled himself from suing, they were not thinking of the reversioner's merely allowing the prescribed period of limitation to run out. In the Allahabad case no question of limitation arose. The cases in Abinash Chandra Mozumdar v. Harinath Shaha (2) and Govinda Pillai v. Thayammal (6) turned on the minority of the plaintiff in each of those cases. The truth appears to be that the various Articles in the Schedule to the Limitation Act dealing with such suits as the present and cognate suits to contest an adoption by a widow were framed with special reference to the provisions of section 42 of the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877). The Schedule, therefore, made no express provision for the rare cases in which a suit like the present is permitted to be brought by a more remote reversioner by reason of collusion or wilful default on the part of the nearest reversioner or reversioners. The result, no doubt, is that such suits must necessarily be referred to Article 120 of the Schedule. It does not follows however, that a remoter reversioner is thereby entitled to sit still and wait for limitation to run out against every reversioner nearer in degree than himself. An improper alienation by a Hindu widow is a wrong to the entire body of reversioners, and in a sense it affords an immediate cause of action to all of them. The reason why such action is ordinarily required to be brought by the nearest reversioner in degree and the special cases in which this rule may be relaxed, have been pretty well settled since the decision of the Privy Council in Rani Anund Kunwar v. Court of Wards (1). But it is for more remote reversioners to be on the watch to safeguard their own interests and when they find that no action is being taken by the nearest reversioner or reversioners, to inquire into the reasons for such inaction and call upon the person or persons entitled to do so to protect the interests of the whole body of reversioners. For the purposes of the present case it is quite sufficient to say that it must lie heavily on the plaintiff in a suit like the present to explain why he took no action before the period of limitation prescribed for a suit by the nearest reversioner had expired. It is not necessary for us to go the full length of the Madras rulings relied on by the learned Subordinate Judge in order to arrive at the conclusion that he has rightly dismissed the present suit as time-barred. So holding we dismiss this appeal with costs, including fees on the higher scale.

As money is moveable property within the meaning of Article 89 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act, a suit by a principal against his agent for money received and not accounted for is governed by Article 89 of the Limitation Act and is barred if not brought within three years of the date of the termination of the agency.

An agency is determined when the agent ceases to represent the principal, though his liability in respect of acts done by him as agent may continue.

Therefore, where an agent in obedience to a telegram sent by his principal hands over the charge to another person, his agency terminates that very day as his authority is revoked.

An agent's contract to account to his principal, whether express or implied, is specially provided for in Article 89 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act and it cannot be included under Article 115 of the Act.

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, C. J.—The first defendant was employed by the plaintiffs, a firm of Nattukottai Chetties of Devakotta in the Ramnad District, to carry on business at certain places in Burmah as their agent under the terms of a document, Exhibit A, known as a salary chit executed by the 1st defendant on his appointment. By this he undertook to carry on the business under the direction of the 1st plaintiff and stipulated that on bringing back the cash and accounts to Devakotta and rendering the same, he was to get back the salary chit. It is explained that in the case of these agents the return of the salary chit means that the agent has passed his accounts and that his conduct has been satisfactory. The present suit is brought by the plaintiffs for an account of his dealings, and the question is whether it is barred by limitation. The 1st defendant continued to represent the plaintiffs in Burmah after the expiry of the three years originally agreed upon, and the plaintiffs who were dissatisfied with his conduct had some difficulty in getting rid of him, as appears from the correspondence. As early as the 24th November 1906 they wired to him to give the keys, accounts, and a power to the 4th defendant who was to succeed him, and at length on the 2nd March 1907, having executed a power-of-attorney in favour of his successer apparently with a view to facilitate the collection of debts owing to the firm, he handed over charge to his successor, who gave him Exhibit IV, a signed receipt, and a list of outstandings which were stated to have been checked, and also apparently Exhibits G and G1, certain further particulars signed by his successor, which he subsequently handed over to the plaintiffs at Devakotta.

He then received a sum of Rs. 200 for his travelling expenses and for sweets and other presents to be purchased for the principals. According to the evidence taken on commission for the plaintiffs, Exhibit VIIIA, this sum was not given as a loan, but he could do what he liked with it. It is customary to pay such sums to agents when they are returning. It is not very easy to reconcile this with the earlier statement made by the witness that if any surplus remained, it was to be handed over to the principal or an account rendered. On his arrival at Madras on the 19th March 1907, the 1st defendant wrote Exhibit H, and wired Exhibit H-1 to plaintiffs announcing his arrival and stating that he was coming in two days. According to the evidence for the plaintiffs, he came later and handed over Exhibits G and G1, but he never accounted for his agency or got back his salary chit.

The question then is, whether in these circumstances the suit is barred. It is now well settled that money is moveable property within the meaning of Article 89 of the Limitation Act. That Article applies to suits by a principal against an agent for moveable property received by the latter and not accounted for and time begins to run "when the account is, during the continuance of the agency, demanded and refused, or where no such demand is made, when the agency terminates." The 1st defendant in the present case relies on the termination of the agency. Under section 201 of the Indian Contract Act an agency is terminated, among other ways, by the principal revoking his authority, or by the agent renouncing the business of the agency, or by the business of the agency being completed, and it is from this point, under Article 89, that time is to begin to run in a suit by the principal for money received or not accounted for. Under section 218 of the Indian Contract Act the agent is, no doubt, bound to pay the principal the sums received on his account, but it cannot be said that until he does so, the agency is not determined because the business of the agency is not completed, for the terms of Article 89 necessarily involve that the agency may be terminated before the payment is made. I am, therefore, with great respect, unable to agree with the observations in Babu Ram v. Ram Dayal (1) and Fink v. Buldeo Dass (2), which do not seem to have been necessary for the decision as there were other grounds for holding that the agency had not been determined. The better view appears to be that the agency is determined when the agent ceases to represent the principal, though his liability in respect of acts done by him as agent may continue.

Article 89 was worded in the present form for the first time in the Act of 1877, but in Hurrinath Rai v. Krishna Kumar Bakshi (3), a case under Act IX of 1871, their Lordships of the Judicial Committee observed that whether Article 60 or Article 90 or Article 118 of that Act applied, time must be counted from the day when the defendant ceased to discharge the duties of dewan by departing from the plaintiff's service. That was a case of termination of the agency by the agent renouncing the business of the agency within the meaning of section 201 of the Indian Contract Act. The present would appear to be an equally clear case of termination of the agency by the principal revoking his authority and the agent handing over charge to his successor. I think that on the facts set out above, his agency was determined before he left Burmah and that as the suit was instituted more than three years later it is barred if Article 89 applies.

It is said, however, that under Exhibit A the 1st defendant was bound to return to Devakotta, hand over the money and accounts and pass his accounts, and that Article 89 is inapplicable as there was an express agreement that the 1st defendant should pass his accounts on his return. The plaintiffs rely on a decision in Jogesh Chandra alias Dhala Ghose v. Benode Lal Roy Chowdhury (4), that where there was a definite contract to render an account yearly, Article 115, and not Article 89, would be the Article applicable in the case of unregistered contracts. This case proceeded to some extent on the authority of a decision in Mati Lal Bose v. Amin Chand Chattopadhy (5), that in the case of a contract in writing registered, Article 89 does not apply, but Article 116. The authority of the latter decision has been doubted in Shib Chandra Roy v. Chandra Narain Mukerjee (6) and Hafezud- din Mandal v. Jadu Nath Saha (7), and it is not in my view conclusive of the present case.

As regards the present question, it seems to me that the agent's contract to account to his principal, whether express or implied, is specially provided for in Article 89, and if that be so, it cannot, having regard to the language of Article 115, be brought under that Article. I am, therefore, unable with great respect to follow the decision in Jogesh Chandra alias Dhalu Ghose v. Benode Lal Roy Chowdhury (4), and hold that the suit was barred and that the appeal must be allowed, and the suit dismissed with costs throughout.

The memorandum of objection is not pressed and is dismissed.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I agree with the learned Chief Justice. The suit is by the plaintiffs, the principals, for an account against the 1st defendant, the agent. The Subordinate Judge disbelieved the plea that the accounts were finally rendered and passed a preliminary decree for the taking of accounts. Mr. C. S. Venkatachariar for the 1st defendant in the appeal argues that the suit is barred by limitation.

With great reluctance I have come to the conclusion that the contention is well-founded. I do not see my way to holding that either Article 115 or Article 120 of the Limitation Act applies to this case, as contended for by Mr. C. V. Ananthakrishna Iyer for the respondents Nos. 1 to 5. Article 115 is the residuary Article relating to contracts and is made applicable only where there is no special provision relating to contracts. Article 120 is the general residuary Article. Article 89 in terms provides for an account respecting moveable property received by the agent from the principal. The Judicial Committee have laid down in Asghar Ali Khan v. Khurshed Ali Khan (8) that money is moveable property within the meaning of this Article. The suggestion of the learned Vakil for the respondents Nos. 1 to 5, that as the account claimed by the principal related to moneys lent out by the agent on his behalf, and which are still unrealised, the present claim is not for moveable property received from the principal, ignores the fact that the outstandings are part of the original advance made by the plaintiff to the defendant and of its augmentation. It was also contended that as Exhibit A provided for the rendering of the account at Devakotta on the return of the agent from Burma, the agency did not terminate till that was done. I am unable to accept this contention. Under section 201 of the Contract Act an agency is terminated by the principal revoking his authority or by the business of the agency being completed. In this case, the plaintiffs sent a telegram on the 24th November 1905 to the 1st defendant to hand over to one Muthiah the accounts (Exhibit VII) on the 18th December 1906; he asked the agent to start immediately (Exhibit VIB). A similar communication was sent on the 20th December 1906 (Exhibit VIIA). On the 2nd March 1907, the 1st defendant handed over the accounts to Muthiah and started for Madras. I am of opinion that the agency terminated on this date and as the suit was instituted more than three years after this date, it is barred by limitation.

The decisions in Babu Ram v. Ram Dayal (1) and Fink v. Buldeo Das (2) do not affect this conclusion. It was held in those cases that until an agent for the sale or purchase of goods pays the sale-proceeds or delivers the purchased properties to the principal, the agency does not terminate. This rests on the ground that the business is not completed with the effecting of the sale or purchase, because it is the essence of an agency in such cases that the sale-proceeds or the property purchased should be handed over to the principal.

It is said that the first defendant took Rs. 200 as passage money for which he had to render an account. There may be a separate accountability for this sum, but this is no part of the business carried on in Rangoon for which the defendant was constituted the agent. It is in evidence that the agent came to Madras and handed over some accounts to the plaintiff at Devakotta. That fact will not have the effect of intercepting the termination of the agency. The business on which the 1st defendant was engaged was completed when he handed over the accounts to Muthiah. That was in obedience to the order of the plaintiffs in that behalf, thereby revoking the agency. The 1st to 5th respondents' Vakil relied on Jogesh Chandra alias Dhalu Ghose v. Benode Lal Roy Chowdhury (4) for the position that when there is a special contract fixing a date for the rendering of the accounts, the Article applicable to suits by principals against agents is Article 115 and not Article 89. The fixing of a date for rendering accounts cannot stop the termination of the agency. The authority relied upon in Jogesh Chandra alias Dhalu Ghose v. Benode Lal Roy Chowdhury (4) has been dissented from by Maclean, C. J., in Hafezuddin Mandal v. Jadu Nath Saha (7). Mr. Justice Mukerjee in Shib Chandra Roy v. Chandra Narain Mukerjee (6) held that Article 89 would apply to a case like the present. I am, therefore, constrained to hold that the suit is barred by limitation.

Appeal allowed; Suit dismissed.

Probate and Administration Act (V of 1881), ss. 23, 30 and 41—Letters of Administration, limited grant of, when not allowed.

In granting Letters to administer the estate of a deceased person, a limited grant of Letters should not be awarded to the attorney of an absent sharer, if a sharer who is entitled to as much as the absent sharer is within the Province and is willing to administer the estate.

Mr. Ormiston, for the Appellant.

Mr. Rutledge, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The answer to the question involved in this appeal is free from doubt. The respondent was a person who, according to the rules for the distribution of the estate of an intestate applicable in the case of the deceased, is entitled to a part of the deceased's estate. He was the only one of such persons who applied for Letters of Administration, a full grant could be given to him under section 23 of the Probate and Administration Act 1881.

The appellant who also applied for Letters is the agent of another sharer in the estate who is absent from the Province. To such agent only a limited grant under Chapter III of the Act could be granted under section 30, and then only if no person as much entitled as his principal was willing to act. A sharer in the estate who is in this Province is willing to act, consequently a limited grant could not be made under section 30 to the attorney of the absent sharer in the estate. The respondent was entitled to a full grant as the Court saw fit to act under section 41 of the Act. No grounds were made out for taking this course.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Interpretation of Statutes—Pensions Act (XXIII of 1871), ss. 11, 12—Legislative enactment, retrospective effect of—Assignment of land revenue—Grant for political services—'Pension,' meaning of.

A legislative enactment is prospective and not retrospective in its operation, except (i) when the Act only affects the procedure of the Court, and (ii) when the intention of the Legislature is clearly to give it a retrospective effect.

Therefore, the Pensions Act has not a retrospective operation and no alienations made before the Act came into force are invalid under section 12 of the Act.

A mere assignment of land revenue as such does not come within the protection given by sections 11 and 12 unless it fulfils other requirements of those sections.

An assignment of land revenue by Government may or may not be a pension, within the meaning of sections 11 and 12; therefore the answer to this question must depend on the facts of each case.

Ordinarily speaking, "pension" involves the idea of a fixed periodical allowance or stipend, and if it is granted on political considerations or for past services or as a compassionate allowance, it cannot be assigned.

Therefore, a grant of a fixed sum clearly made for political services is a political pension and comes within the protection afforded by section 12.

Lala Lajpat Rai, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, K. B., for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a dispute between the descendants of two brothers, Sayed Rajab Ali and Sayed Rustam Ali. The plaintiffs, who are the descendants of Rajab Ali, sue Sayed Karar Hassan, son of Rustam Ali Khan, for the recovery of Rs. 817 on account of the jagir income for 1906, which has been realized by him, and for a perpetual injunction restraining him from recovering the jagir money from defendants Nos. 2 and 3, the lambardars of Mauza Aligarh, whose duty is to realise the land revenue from the proprietors and pay it to the person entitled to the jagir.

It is not disputed that the jagir was granted to Rajab Ali for political services and after his death has continued to be recorded in the names of his descendants. It appears that for nearly 50 years Rustam Ali Khan and Karar Hassan have been realizing the jagir, but whether this was in pursuance of a transfer of the jagir by Rajab Ali to his brother or for some other reason, is a point at issue between the parties and has not been decided by the Courts below. The defendant's contention is that in1847 Rajab Ali transferred the jagir to Rustam Ali Khan in lieu of the transfer of Mauza Mirpur and a share in a garden at Jagraon by the latter in favour of the former and that this exchange has all along been acted upon by the parties and their ancestors. This plea forms the subject-matter of issues Nos. 9 and 10 and has, as stated above, not been adjudicated upon by the lower Courts.

The suit of the plaintiffs has been decreed by the Courts below on the ground that the jagir in question is a political pension within the purview of section 12 of the Pensions Act, XXIII of 1871, and that the provisions of the Act apply to the transfer relied upon by the defendant. Any alienation, if made, is, according to the lower Courts, void under section 12 and cannot be binding upon the plaintiffs. On appeal to this Court, the correctness of these findings has been impugned by the defendant, Karar Hassan, and we have listened to the arguments advanced by Mr. Lajpat Rai and Mr. Muhammad Shafi in support of their contentions.

The first point which requires decision is whether the provisions of the Pensions Act are or are not applicable to the alienation set up by the principal defendant. On this point, we are of opinion that if the alienation took place before the date on which the Act came into force, it cannot be rendered invalid by invoking the aid of an enactment passed subsequent to the transaction. It is now a well-recognised canon of the interpretation of Statutes that a legislative enactment is prospective and not retrospective in its operation.

This rule admits of two exceptions: (1) when the Act only affects the procedure of the Court, and (2) when it appears clearly that the intention of the Legislature was to give a retrospective effect. Now, section 12 of the Pensions Act which avoids an assignment of a pension does not contain a rule of procedure, and the sole question is whether there are words in the Act which show clearly that it was intended to apply to contracts which were in existence at the date of its coming into force. We have read the section carefully and considered the arguments of Mr. Shafi and are unable to find any indication, much less a clear intention, that the section takes away vested rights. The construction contended for by the learned

KARAR HASSAN v. MUSTAFA HASSAN.

Counsel for the respondents would cause great inconvenience and injustice and give the section an operation which would deprive persons of the rights which vested in them long before the Act came into force. This would be manifestly unjust and contrary to the intention of the Legislature.

We are fortified in our view by the decision of the Allahabad High Court in Imtiaz Begam v. Liakat-un-nissa Begam (1), which overrules an ex parte judgment of that Court in Imtiaz Begam v. Liakat-un-nissa Begam (2), and of the Bombay High Court in Jamnadas v. Lalitaram (3) and Dharamdas v. Sambhudas Hafasji (4), which lay down the rule that the Pensions Act has not a retrospective operation.

In the absence of any other law rendering an assignment of jagir invalid, we are clearly of opinion that the lower Courts are in error in holding that the alleged alienation in favour of the defendant's father, even if it took place before the Pensions Act came into force, was null and void. The issue as to the factum and the date of the alienation should be tried by the Court of first instance and if it be found that the alienation took place prior to the date of passing of the Pensions Act, the transaction must be regarded as vaild.

The next question which we have to consider relates to the nature of the grant in favour of Rajab Ali. Suppose the transfer took place after the Pensions Act came into force, is it invalid under section 12 ? In other words, is it an assignment of a political or service pension ?

We find that section 4 of the Act has a wide operation and includes within its scope not only a pension but also a grant of money or land revenue. The same is the case with sections 5 and 8. When we come to sections 11 and 12 we find no mention therein of grants of money or land revenue. A compromise of the wording of the different sections of the Act leads us to the conclusion that an assignment of a grant of land revenue is not prohibited by section 12, unless such grant comes within the meaning of the word "pension" and is made for the consideration specified in section 11.

The authorities quoted by the learned Pleader for the appellant do not lay down the proposition that an assignment of land revenue can never be a pension for the purposes of sections 11 and 12.

In Baha-ud-Din v. Moti Lal (5), the assignment of land revenue was made to the custodian of a shrine for the benefit thereof and could not be a pension under sections 11 and 12, because the purpose for which it was made was not one of those specified in the sections.

The judgment in Kundan Lal v. Dalip Singh(6) contains a dictum that the income of a jagir is not protected from attachment either by section 266 (g) of the Civil Procedure Code or section 11 of the Pensions Act, but the ratio decidendi is not clear. To the same effect is the law laid down in Shankar Das v. Basant Singh (7). In both these cases property sought to be attached was assigned land revenue, and we have no hesitation in holding that a mere assignment of land revenue as such does not come within the protection given by sections 11 and 12 unless it fulfils other requirements of those sections.

The word "pension" has not been defined in the Act and we do not propose to lay down any definition which would be exhaustive. Ordinarily speaking "pension" involves the idea of a fixed periodical allowance or stipend and if it is granted on political considerations or for past services or as a compassionate allowance, it cannot be assigned. But a grant by Government does not, in our opinion, cease to be a pension because it takes the form of an assignment of land revenue [vide Bodhraj Shah v. Sirdar Amrikh Singh (8)].

In Muhammad Qamar-ud-din Khan v. Lachmi Nath (9) and Qamar-ud-din Khan v. Mani Ram (10), the jagir income was held to be a pension and exempt from attachment in execution of a decree.

The principle which we deduce from the authorities cited before us is that an assignment of land revenue by Government may or may not be a pension within the meaning of sections 11 and 12 and the answer to the question must depend upon the facts of each case.

In the present case the material on the record does not give us sufficient information as to the origin and history of the grant. There is, however, one important document which throws a good deal of light upon the point before us. The sanad of 31st August 1868 in favour of Rajab Ali shows that the grant of Rs. 2,696, which was previously partly in perpetuity and partly for life, was made wholly a perpetual grant for the future and payable by the assignment of the land revenue assessed on Mauzas Tilondi Kalan and Aligarh. The grant was of a fixed sum and was clearly made for political services.

We, therefore, hold that the grant of the land revenue of Mauza Aligarh, which is the subject-matter of the contest between the parties, is a political pension and comes within the protection afforded by section 12.

The plea of estoppel raised for the appellant has no application to the present case and must be overruled.

As the decisions of the lower Courts have proceeded upon assumptions of facts and as there has been no proper trial of the suit, we must set aside the judgments and decrees of the Courts below and remit the case for re-decision.

We, therefore, accept the appeal, set aside the decrees of the lower Courts and direct the Court of first instance to decide the case with reference to the foregoing remarks. The Court-fees on the appeal to this Court and the Divisional Court shall be refunded and other costs shall be costs in the cause.

Court Fees Act (VII of 1870), ss. 9, 10—Valuation determined by Commissioner—Plaintiff failing to pay additional Court-fee within prescribed period—Suit to be dismissed—Plaint not to be rejected—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. VII, r. 11—Option to abandon part of claim for which Court-fee not paid in time.

If as the result of an inquiry under section 9 of the Court Fees Act a Court directs the plaintiff, if he wishes to continue the suit, to pay the required additional Court-fee within a time fixed by the Court and the plaintiff fails to do so, the plaint should not be rejected under Order VII, rule 11, Civil Procedure Code, but the suit itself should be dismissed under section 10 of the Court Fees Act.

A plaintiff who has not properly valued his claim or paid a sufficient Court-fee is not entitled at the last moment to an option to abandon part of his claim and retain only that part for which he has paid a sufficient Court-fee.

Appeal from an order passed by the District Judge of Broach, in Appeal No. 15 of 1913, reversing the decree passed by, and remanding the suit to, the first Class Subordinate Judge of Broach, in Civil Suit No. 266 of 1913.

Mr. G. N. Thakor, for the Appellants.

Mr. Ramlal Ranchhoddas, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case we are of opinion that the order of the District Judge is wrong and must be reversed. The suit was brought in 1911, and there was a reference to a Commissioner in regard to the value of the houses and sites claimed in the suit for the purposes of Court-fees. The Commissioner reported unfavourably to the plaintiffs, who, however, did not accept the report and obtained a further inquiry by the Court. Ultimately the Court adopted the Commissioner's valuation with some modification and directed the plaintiffs, if they wished to continue the suit, to pay the required additional Court-fee. They were given a month in which to pay that Court-fee. They failed to do so. The Court then, acting under its powers under section 10 of the Court Fees Act, dismissed the suit. The dismissal of the suit was of importance to the defendant, because it had only been filed just before the period of limitation elapsed for a suit of that nature, and any suit filed subsequently to the order of dismissal would be barred.

From the order of dismissal an appeal was preferred to the District Judge on the ground that the lower Court had misused its discretion in rejecting the plaintiffs' application for further time, that is to say, time beyond the 13th February 1913. The learned District Judge, however, thought that the discretion was wisely used. So then, as far as the exercise of discretion goes, both Courts were of the same opinion. The learned District Judge, however, thought the order should have been in the form of rejection of plaint under Order VII, rule 11, and that there was authority contained in Raghubans Puri v. Jyotis Swarupa (1) to show that an option should have been given to the plaintiffs to abandon part of their claim and retain only that part for which they had paid a sufficient Court-fee prior to the 13th February 1913. We are of opinion that the Allahabad decision referred to does not justify the conclusion of the learned Judge, and we are not aware of any provision of law or any authority which shows that a plaintiff who has not properly valued his claim or paid a sufficient Court-fee, is entitled at the last moment to an option such as was allowed to him by the District Judge. The plaintiffs have only themselves to thank for the result of the case in the first Court. The defendants are entitled to rely upon the important benefit that they have obtained through the order of dismissal. We, therefore, set aside the order of the District Judge and restore that of the first Court dismissing the suit with costs. The plaintiffs must pay the costs throughout. The cross-objections are also dismissed with costs.

Order set aside.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 13, 32—Transaction—Admission against interest—Documents containing recitals as to whether property belongs to particular persons—Admissibility in evidence.

The word "transaction" in section 13 of the Evidence Act means a business or dealing which is carried on or transacted between two or more persons.

In a case where certain properties were claimed as the property of a particular family, the following documents were put in evidence:—

(1) Sale-deeds executed by the widows of the family asserting that the properties covered by them belonged to their husbands;

(2) written statements filed by them in suits to which they were parties and in which they had made recitals;

(3) Recitals in a sale-deed between third persons in which, in describing the boundary of the property sold, the suit property was described as that of the particular family.

Held, (Per Ayling, J.)—that the documents mentioned in (1) and (2) were admissible in evidence under section 13 (a) of the Evidence Act, as "transactions;" but the documents mentioned in (3) were not admissible in evidence either under section 13 (a) as a "transaction" or under section 32 as an admission against interest.

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—That all documents were inadmissible in evidence.

JUDGMENT.

AYLING, J.—The sole ground of appeal argued before us is that the judgment of the lower Appellate Court is based on inadmissible evidence, i.e., Exhibits A and A1, B and B1 and G.

SARIPALLI VENKATARAYAGOPALA RAJU v. FOTA NARASAYYA.

As regards Exhibits A and A1, I am inclined to hold that they are covered by section 13 (a) of the Indian Evidence Act. Plaintiff has to establish the title of his vendors to the suit land; but this turns mainly on whether the land belongs to the Tangella family of which they are members. The case set up by defendants was not that the person entitled to dispose of it was some other member of that family. They pleaded that it never belonged to the Tangella family at all, but was acquired by 1st defendant's great-grandfather and that the name it bore ("Tangellavari Doddi") had no significance.

I think the right of the Tangella family to the plaint land was in question in this suit. Exhibits A and A1 are sale-deeds in which two widows of the Tangella family sold the same property to strangers, as if it was Tangella family property.

These are transactions by which other members of the Tangella family asserted the same right which is now in question. It is not necessary that the assertion should be by parties to the present suit or their predecessors. I consider that Exhibits A and A1 come under section 13 (a) of the Indian Evidence Act.

Exhibits B and B1 are copies of the written statements filed by the same two widows in subsequent litigation. They are mentioned, but hardly seem to be relied on by the Subordinate Judge. I do not regard such documents as "transactions" within the meaning of section 13 of the Indian Evidence Act. The words of this section must, in my opinion, be strictly construed. I would respectfully adopt the definition of "transaction" given by Garth, C. J., in Gujja Lal v. Fatteh Lall (1) as a "business or dealing which is carried on or transacted between two or more persons." The sale-deeds (Exhibits A and A1) fall within this definition, but not these written statements filed in the subsequent suit, and I consider the latter to be inadmissible.

Exhibit G is a sale-deed of an adjoining site between strangers which, in specifying boundaries, describes the suit land as belonging to Tangella Ramudu. This is a transaction, but it is not a transaction by which the right of the Tangella people is asserted, claimed or even recognised: it is a transaction in which the said right is incidentally mentioned. It is not admissible under section 13 (a) and I agree with my learned brother, following In re Daddapaneni Narayanappa (2), that it cannot be treated as an admission against interest.

I am, therefore, inclined to hold that Exhibits B and B1 and G are not admissible. But I agree with my learned brother that having regard to section 167 of the Indian Evidence Act, it is not necessary to interfere with the decree of the lower Appellate Court on this ground alone.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The plaintiff claimed the plaint property by purchase from Tangella Dharmayya and others. First defendant claimed it as his own. The main issue related to the title of the Tangella people. The Subordinate Judge, differing from the Munsif, came to the conclusion that the property belonged to plaintiff's vendors, the Tangella people, and not to 1st defendant. This finding is attacked on the ground that it is based on inadmissible evidence. Exhibits A and A1, B and B1, and G are objected to. A and A1 are sale-deeds by some widows of the Tangella family in which they said that the property belonged to their husbands. B and B1 are written statements by these widows in a suit wherein also they pleaded that the property belonged to their husbands. Exhibit G is a sale-deed of a piece of land by a neighbouring owner in which, in describing the boundaries, the plaint property is described as that of the Tangella people. The respondent's Vakil cited Ningawa v. Bharmappa (3) in support of the position that the recitals in these documents were evidence. That was a case in which the executants were dead and the learned Judges said that the recital in a mortgage-deed describing the plaint site as belonging to a particular person was a statement against the interest of the person executing the mortgage-deed, inasmuch as he did not lay claim to the property which bound his. With all respect, I am unable to agree with this view. If this is correct, it would follow that any person who states that a particular property belongs to another should be held to have made a statement against his interest, because he lays no claim to it himself. I respectfully differ from Ningawa v. Bharmappa (3). I agree with Mr. Justice Krishnasamy Iyer in In re Daddapaneni Narayanappa (2) that such recitals are not evidence under section 32 of the Evidence Act.

The more difficult question for consideration is whether they can be admitted under section 13 of the Evidence Act. There is no authority for the proposition that the recital, in order that it may be admissible, must have been made by a party to the suit or by a person through whom he claims. The language of the section imposes no such restrictions. But I am inclined to think that these documents are not transactions by which the right in question was asserted or recognised. In the case of G, there can be no doubt that the transaction, namely, the sale-deed did not assert or recognise the right of the Tangella people. The definition of the term "transaction" given in the well-known case, Gujja Lall v. Fatteh Lall (1), makes it clear that the description of the boundary is not a transaction (see definition of 'transaction" per Jackson, J., and Garth, C. J., in that case). As regards A and A1 the widows state that the property belonged to their husbands. It is not a transaction in which the right of the vendors in this case was asserted. B and B1 are of the same character. It may be suggested that these documents came under clause (b) of section 13. In order to hold that the recitals in these documents are "instances", it must be shown, in the language of Baron Parke in Jones v. Williams (4), that there must be a common character of locality or of continuity to make the evidence let in, an "instance" of the question to be decided. I am of opinion that these statements in the sale-deeds are not instances as contemplated in clause (b).

I, therefore, hold that these documents are not admissible to prove the right of the Tangella people. Exhibits A and A1 are, however, admissible for another purpose. The land in dispute was known as the 'Tangella people's site.' Evidence is admissible under sections 95 and 96 of the Evidence Act to explain this expression, and it is for this purpose the Subordinate Judge has used these documents. They show that the Tangella people laid claim to the suit site. This evidence repels the suggestion of the defendant that the expression is only descriptive of the property and does not mean that the Tangella people had a right to it. My conclusion is that A and A1 were rightly considered by the Subordinate Judge. Although I have held that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in referring to Exhibit G and that Exhibits B and B1 are not evidence I am of opinion that independently of these documents there was sufficient evidence upon which the Subordinate Judge was entitled to come to the conclusion at which he has arrived.

I am satisfied that these three documents did not materially influence him in his finding. Section 167 of the Evidence Act applies. It is, therefore, unnecessary to send the case down for hearing. I agree that the second appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. D. A. Khare, for the Appellant.

Mr. N. K. Mehta, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—We do not think it necessary in this case to call upon the learned Pleader who appears for the Talukdari Settlement Officer in support of the judgment of the lower Appellate Court, for although, as at present advised, we think that the notification purporting to have been issued under section 29B of the Gujarat Talukdars Act was not a sufficient reference to the Talukdar-debtor and his property to extinguish the claim of the plaintiff, if the claim was not submitted under that section, the plaintiff's suit must fail because he has not given notice as required under section 80 of the Civil Procedure Code. The cause of action in the present case is the process initiated by the Talukdari Settlement Officer to enforce the eviction of the plaintiff from the property in question. Section 79A of the Land Revenue Code provides that: any person unauthorisedly occupying, or wrongly in possession of, any land, which he uses or occupies in contravention of any of the provisions of the Gujarat Talukdars Act of 1888, may be evicted summarily by the Collector. Then section 202 of the same Code provides that "whenever it is provided by this or by any other Act...that the Collector may or shall evict any person wrongfully in possession of land, such eviction shall be made in the following manner:—by serving a notice on the person or persons in possession, requiring them...to vacate, and if such notice is not obeyed, by removing... any person who may refuse to vacate." Therefore, the service of the notice which has led to this suit is the first act in the process of eviction provided by section 202 of the Land Revenue Code, and the suit being to restrain the accomplishment of the act of eviction is a suit against a public officer in respect of an act purporting to be done by him in his official capacity, and, therefore, section 80 of the Civil Procedure Code requires as a condition precedent to the institution of the suit a notice which has not been given. The suit must, therefore, be dismissed. Each party should bear his own costs throughout.

Mr. T. R. Desai, for the Appellants.

Mr. A. B. Gumaste, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

HAYWARD, J.—The plaintiffs sued as purchasers from the defendants to recover possession of the purchased lands which were subsequently leased to the defendants. The defendants pleaded that the transactions amounted really to a mortgage which they were entitled to redeem, and not to a sale and subsequent lease, owing to a contemporaneous agreement for a re-sale. The original Court held in all the circumstances that the two documents effected a mortgage and not a sale. The first Appeal Court held on a practically similar view of the circumstances that the two documents constituted a sale with an agreement for a re-sale.

The judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge is not as clear as it might have been and consists very largely of a vain repetition of the evidence without any indication of the particular bearing of the evidence quoted upon the issues to be determined. But it appears that the following material facts were held established. On the 16th of September 1892, a relation of defendants sold his interest in the lands for Rs. 300 to one Manikchand. On the 7th of November 1892 defendants bought out Manikchand for Rs. 300 raised by the sale and re-sale in suit. From 1895 onwards the defendants remained in possession as tenants of their purchaser with liability to pay the assessment amounting to Rs. 32 at a nominal rent of about Rs. 50. But as a matter of fact the assessment was not paid by the tenants but by the purchaser, so that the rent actually received was about Rs. 18 only, which would be interest at 6 per cent. on the purchase-money, Rs. 300, instead of the nominal rent of Rs. 50. There was, subsequent to the sale and re-sale a transfer of the names in favour of defendant No. 1, and not in favour of the purchaser, in the Revenue Records. There was evidence to show that Rs. 300 was a wholly inadequate price for the lands. Two Kulkarnis stated that a fair rent would have been Rs. 75 a year, so that the real value of the lands would have been anything from Rs. 750 to Rs. 1,500. It appears that these were the facts upon which the original Court held that the real intention of the parties in executing the two documents of sale and re-sale was to effect a mortgage, and not an absolute sale with agreement of re-sale.

The first Appeal Court appears to have accepted these facts generally though the learned Judge, without stating definitely that he considered Rs. 300 a fair price, cast some doubt upon the value of the lands as estimated. On those facts he came to the opposite conclusion, namely, that the proper construction of the two documents was that they effected an absolute sale with an agreement for re-sale.

On second appeal to this Court, it has been urged that in view of the facts established and the contemporaneous nature of the two documents the proper construction would be that they constituted conditional sale. We have no doubt in all the circumstances that that is the proper construction and that the real intention of the parties was to effect a mortgage by conditional sale by the contemporaneous execution of the two documents of sale and re-sale. It was suggested on the other side that it was not open to us to speculate on the exact relations of the parties in this suit, which was in form one between a landlord and tenant, but it appears to us that the real nature of the leases as well as of the transactions of sale and re-sale have been called in question in this litigation, and that we are bound to consider them in view of the very wide terms of section 10A of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

We must, accordingly, allow this appeal and restore the decision of the original Court and reverse that of the Appeal Court. Each party to bear his own costs of both appeals.

BEAMAN, J.—I concur in the judgment just delivered by my learned brother. I have no doubt but that the contemporaneous documents of 1892 do constitute what is known in this country as a mortgage by conditional sale. Neither have I the least doubt that that was the intention of the parties executing them. Such mortgages are legislatively recognised, and I have only to observe that in no true mortgage of this class will any debt be apparent. It is idle, therefore, to criticise mortgages by conditional sale by reference to the essential conditions of a mortgage in the English sense of that word. It only needs to peruse the judgments of the Courts relating to these mortgages to observe how necessary it is to bear this in mind when the question is, whether upon an interpretation of documents alone the result is a mortgage by conditional sale or an out and out sale.

Mortgage—Charge—Construction of deed.

Where by a deed of transfer the executant hypothecates his interest in the property and covenants to pay interest and also that he will not transfer the property so long as the debt remains unpaid, the deed constitutes a simple mortgage and not a charge.

Second appeal from the decision of the Additional Judge of Aligarh, dated 16th June 1913.

Dr. S. C. Banerji and Messrs. B. K. Mukerjee and S. C. Chaudhri, for the Appellant.

Mr. P. L. Banerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought on foot of a mortgage, dated the 14th of June 1889. A number of pleas were taken putting the plaintiff upon full proof. Both the Courts below have held that the mortgage was duly executed for good consideration. The Court of first instance decreed the plaintiff's claim. The lower Appellate Court reversed the decree of the Court of first instance, holding that the document did not amount to more than a charge and accordingly was barred by limitation, the suit not having been instituted until the year 1910.

In our opinion the decision of the lower Appellate Court was wrong. The mortgage is in form a simple mortgage, that is to say, the mortgagor states that he is hypothecating the interest he has and covenants to pay the interest, and that he will not transfer the property so long as the debt remains unpaid in whole or in part. This form of security has for many years been interpreted by this Court as a simple mortgage within the meaning of the Transfer of Property Act. It is admitted that if the property mortgaged had been ordinary zemindari rights the contention that it is not a simple mortgage would be unarguable. But it is said that the property which the mortgagor Muhammad Yusuf Ali had consisted of the rights of a usufructuary mortgagee jointly with certain other persons. In our opinion this can make no difference whatever. The property which was mortgaged by Yusuf Ali Khan was his interest in the mortgagee rights and the plaintiff is entitled to have a sale of those rights for the purpose of realising the amount of the mortgage, provided the suit was instituted within time. The present suit was instituted within time, having regard to the provisions of section 31 of the Limitation Act of 1908. We must allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and restore the decree of the Court of first instance with costs in all Courts including in this Court fees on the higher scale. We extend the time for payment to six months from this date.

Messrs. D. A. Khare and P. D. Bhide, for the Appellant.

Mr. T. R. Desai (with him Mr. Ratanlal Ranchhoddas), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit for redemption by the plaintiff to recover a house. The question for decision by the lower Courts was, whether the transaction with reference to which the plaint was instituted was a sale or a mortgage. On the 30th March 1900, three documents were executed. One of them purported to be a sale-deed. It recited that the house had been given in mortgage with possession to one Jagjiwandas Kaliandas in 1897, but the mortgagor had got possession of it as a tenant and continued to hold it as a tenant up to the 30th March 1900, and that a decree had been obtained by the mortgagee in 1900 and Rs. 175 was due. This amount had been paid by Ghelabhai Atmaram, the ostensible vendee, and the balance of Rs. 224 had been paid in cash making altogether Rs. 399, and consequently the house having been redeemed from the mortgagee was taken from the possession of the mortgagor and given into the possession of the ostensible vendee, who was made the absolute owner.

Another document executed between the parties at the same time was one by which the ostensible vendor said that he had taken the house on hire from the vendee at Rs. 2-4-0 a month, or Rs. 27 a year, but the vendee might at any time demand possession of the house and it was then to be given up to him.

The third contemporaneous document was one by which the vendee agreed that, if within three years the vendor paid Rs. 399 as principal and paid from month to month the rent accruing due under the rent-note passed that day for Rs. 27 as rent every year, he would re-sell the house to the vendor at his expense at any time within three years. Then there was a clause that, if the rent was not paid for three consecutive months, the agreement for re-sale should not be binding upon the vendee. The fourth clause, not following the law of landlord and tenant as expressed in section 108 of the Transfer of Property Act, provided that if within three years the house was destroyed by any calamity or vis major, still the vendee and his heirs and representatives had the right to recover the principal amount of Rs. 399 and the rent which might be due from the person or the property of the vendor, or his legal representatives, or from the land of the house, or from whatever other source he pleased, a provision suggestive of one of the remedies of a mortgagee under section 68 of the Transfer of Property Act. In the 6th clause there is again a reference to the principal sum of Rs. 399 and the rent which may be due.

Now the rent amounts to $6\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. upon Rs. 399, and we have no difficulty in arriving at the same conclusion as was arrived at by the Judges in the two lower Courts that these three documents read together amount to a mortgage of the house, that is to say, a transfer of the property with the right of redemption within a fixed period and an agreement to pay rent in lieu of reasonable interest. It does not appear to us that the facts in the cases which have been relied upon, such as Kapildeo Singh v. Ramrikha Singh (1) and Alderson v. White (2), are so similar to the facts in this case that we ought to arrive at the same conclusion as was arrived at by the Courts in those cases. Agreeing as we do with the lower Courts, we confirm the decree and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Where an endorsement of payment of money is relied on as an acknowledgment of liability under section 19 of the Limitation Act, the fact that no money was paid on that date does not make the endorsement inoperative if it was the intention of the parties that it should be treated as such.

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Madura, in Small Cause Suit No. 2607 of 1913, dated 29th October 1913.

Mr. C. S. Venkatachariar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. R. Rangasamy Aiyangar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The defendant admits on his evidence that he made the endorsement with a view to keep the document alive. The endorsement runs as follows: "Received towards interest of this promissory note Rs. 18." The Subordinate Judge finds that no money was actually paid and I see no reason to differ from him. It is alleged that Rs. 18 was paid in adjustment of house rent, but this was never set up in the lower Court.

The next question is whether the endorsement is sufficient as an acknowledgment of liability. In Appeal No. 124 of 1911 it was held that an acknowledgment that ran as follows, "In respect of the mustajari lease * * * * * * Visvanadha Santo sent Rs. 20 * * * the same should be credited to the chitta (account) and receipt granted," was a sufficient acknowledgment of liability.

In Second Appeal No. 666 of 1913, their Lordships following the previous decision held that an entry in the terms, "paid in respect of this note," was sufficient acknowledgment of liability. I am bound to follow the above decision whatever my own views might be. The fact that no money was actually paid does not make the endorsement inoperative as an acknowledgment if it was the intention of the parties that it should be treated as one.

I reverse the decree of the Subordinate Judge and remand the suit for disposal on the other issue. Costs will abide and follow the result.

Decree reversed.

Execution of decree—Decree directing payment of money within prescribed period—Provision for forfeiture of right to recover possession of land if money not paid within prescribed period—Payment made within prescribed period after decree's confirmation in appeal—Right to recover possession of land, whether forfeited.

Where the decree of a Court directs a party, as a condition precedent to his recovering possession of certain property, to pay to another party within a prescribed period a certain sum of money, and also provides that if the former fails to pay as directed within the prescribed period, he shall forfeit his right to recover possession of the property and the party so directed pays the requisite amount within the same period, not from the decree of that Court, but from the decree of the Appellate Court which confirms the decree of the lower Court on that party's appeal, he does not forfeit his right to recover possession of the property.

Second appeal from the decision of the Additional Assistant Judge at Thana, in Appeal No. 20 of 1913, confirming the order passed by the Subordinate Judge at Murbad, in Darkhast No. 212 of 1912.

Mr. P. D. Bhide, for the Appellant.

Mr. T. R. Desai, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The suit in relation to which the execution proceedings now in question have been taken was brought by the plaintiff against the first six defendants as vendors, who denied his title as purchaser, and against the 7th defendant as mortgagee from the other defendants, to enforce his purchase against the vendors and to redeem the mortgage.

The original Court dismissed the suit, holding that the plaintiff's title as purchaser was not established as he had not paid the full purchase-money and was not ready and willing to perform his contract. The first Appeal Court, however, reversed the decree of the original Court and passed a decree that on the plaintiff paying defendants Nos. 1 to 6 the sum of Rs. 203-1-8 and paying all costs in the suit within six months from the date of the decree, he should be put in possession of the property and should then pay defendant No. 7 the sum of Rs. 997-8 found due on the mortgage with further interest from the date of recovering possession to date of payment on Rs. 633, by annual instalments of Rs. 150 payable in February of each year beginning with February 1912, and that if the plaintiff failed to pay the sum due to the defendants Nos. 1 to 6 and costs within six months from the date of the decree, he should forfeit his right to recover possession of the land.

None of the parties were satisfied by this decree. The plaintiff within ninety days filed an appeal to the High Court and the two sets of defendants filed separate sets of cross-objections. The decree was, however, confirmed by the High Court and the appeal and cross-objections were dismissed.

Within six months from the date of the High Court decree the plaintiff deposited in Court the amount payable by him. The defendant No. 7 then put in an objection that the plaintiff not having complied with the terms of the decree of the first Appellate Court, his right to recover possession in execution was forfeited.

Both the lower Courts have upheld this objection on the authority of Ramaswamy Kone v. Sundara Kone (1). There is, however, the direct authority of this Court to the contrary : see Nanchand v. Vithu (2). It was there said : "Both parties must be held equally bound or equally benefited by the result of this second appeal, and if the original respondents would have become entitled to execute the decree of the High Court in case it had reversed the decision of the lower Courts, we do not see any reason which prevents the present appellant from claiming his right to execute the decree of the High Court in his favour." These observations, which were based upon a similar state of facts, are applicable to the present case and the lower Courts should have followed that decision. It was in accordance with a decision reported in Sakhalchand Rikhawdas v. Velchand Gujar (3).

The decision of the Madras High Court followed by the lower Courts refers to the judgment of Sir John Edge in Jaggar Nath Pande v. Jokhu Tewari (4), which was based upon the express provisions of section 214 of the Civil Procedure Code applicable in decrees in pre-emption suits, but we do not understand that judgment as throwing any doubt on the Full Bench decision in Muhammad Sulaiman Khan v. Muhammad Yar Khan (5) delivered by the same learned Chief Justice and applied in Sakhalchand Rikhawdas v. Velchand Gujar (3) and Nanchand v. Vithu (2), or the Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court, Shohrat Singh v. Bridgman (6), explained and adopted in Muhammad Sulaiman Khan v. Muhammad Yar Khan (5). The observations of Banerji, J., in Bhola Nath Bhuttacharjee v. Kanti Chundra Bhuttacharjee (7), referred to in Ramaswamy Kone v. Sundara Kone (1) and relied on by the respondent's Pleader before us, were in a case where the decree of the lower Court had been dismissed and not confirmed ; and BAHADRI v. EMPEROR.

Banerji, J., may have had in mind the possible distinction between dismissal and confirmation indicated by Jenkins, C. J., in Kailash Chandra Basu v. Girija Sundari Debi (8). Of the other cases cited for the respondent, Patloji v. Ganu (9) was a case where there was no decision on final appeal but only a dismissal for non-prosecution in the final appeal and similar, therefore, to the decision of the Judicial Committee in Chaudhri Abdul Majid v. Jawahir Lal (10), in which it was held that the time for executing a decree nisi for sale of mortgaged property ran from the date of the High Court decree confirming the decree of the first Court. Aminabi v. Sidu (11) was a case where the decree had been legally executed before the appeal and the defendant never applied for a stay of execution or tendered the money payable by him till after the dismissal of the appeal. We also think that the decision in Raja Bhup Indar Bahadur Singh v. Bijai Bahadur Singh (12) is an authority in the appellant's favour. What has to be looked at and interpreted is the decree of the final Appellate Court, in this case the High Court.

We reverse the decree of the lower Court, set aside the defendant's objection and remand the plaintiff's application in execution for disposal according to law.

Defendant No. 7 to pay the costs of the objection throughout.

BAHADRI AND ANOTHER—APPLICANT

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Chenab Canal Colony - Confiscation of squares for absence from chak—Habitable house.

Throughout the whole of the Lower Chenab Colony the fact that a grantee has a habitable house in his chak, must be accepted as conclusive evidence that he is fulfilling the condition of residence.

Petition for revision against the order of the Commissioner, Lahore, dated 23rd December 1913.

ORDER.—(March 26th, 1914).—I shall be glad if the Commissioner will instruct an officer of standing, not lower than Tahsildar, to visit the chak and report whether the applicants have a residential house there which is fit to live in. The time has come in the Chenab Colony when the existence of a residential house fit to live in should be accepted as evidence of owner's residence.

(May 25th, 1914).—The facts of this case are that the ousted grantees have a substantial house in the chak which is fit to live in and is provided with all necessary furniture. From the lambardar's statement, in vernacular, it appears that the applicants have paid their share of expenses incurred in the building of the village mosque and the village drinking well. Not having obtained proprietary rights, they were technically liable to be ousted by reason of their non-residence and an order of confiscation was passed against them on March 28th, 1913.

The house is said to have been built 15 or 16 years ago, and I gather that the grant which has now been confiscated dates back to the early days of settlement on the Rakh Branch of the Lower Chenab Canal.

For the first 12 or 15 years of a new Colony's existence, the settlement is in some measure precarious and there is special justification for insisting meticulously on the condition of residence. Later on, when the Colony is firmly established, the absence or presence of a particular grantee becomes a matter of little or no public importance. If he has not acquired proprietary rights, he retains, no doubt, his technical liability to fulfil the condition of personal residence; but it becomes very undesirable to enforce this by confiscation and the proper course is to accept the existence of a habitable house as sufficient evidence of residence, and to make no further inquisition into the habits of the grantee. One great objection to the continuance of inquiries of this kind is the very undesirable power which they place in the hands of subordinate officials.

I hold, therefore, that the time has now come throughout the whole of the Lower Chenab Colony when the fact that a grantee has a habitable house in his chak, must be accepted as conclusive evidence that he is fulfilling the condition of residence. In order to apply this principle in the present case, inquiry will be made as to the disposal of the square which was confiscated, and restoration will be ordered, if feasible.

(August 31st, 1914).—I now order the restoration of the confiscated square to the persons from whom it was taken.

Petition accepted.

NACHIAPPA GOUNDEN, MINOR, BY HIS GUARDIAN, NALLAMMAL—DEFENDANT No. 2 —APPELLANT

RANGASAMI GOUNDEN AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFF, DEFENDANT No. 3's LEGAL REPRESENTATIVE AND DEFENDANTS Nos. 4 TO 30 —RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Widow, gift by—Consent of reversioner, effect of—Alienation—Surrender—Re-grant—Evidence—Presumption—Estoppel—Partial alienation—Inheritance—Full blood and half blood, preference between.

A man who takes a deed is not ordinarily bound by statements contained in it, but where it is open to a plaintiff, in his character of next reversioner of a last male owner, to avoid or recognize a gift made by a widow, his conduct in taking a mortgage of the property which was the subject of gift from the representatives of the donee, is a representation to persons afterwards dealing with the property, whether as transferees of his mortgage or purchasers, that he is satisfied as to the transaction and does not propose to question it as next reversioner, and he is estopped from questioning the alienation of that property by the widow.

Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Krishna Mahishi Debi, 34 C. 329; 9 Bom. L. R. 602; 11 C. W. N. 424; 5 C. L. J. 334; 2 M. L. T. 133; 17 M. L. J 154; 4 A. L. J. 329; 34 I. A. 87 (P. C.), followed.

The effect of the consent of the next reversioner to an alienation made by a widow is conclusive.

Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh, 30 A. 1; 3 M. L. T. 1; 12 C. W. N. 74; 9 Bom. L. R. 1348; 6 C. L. J. 766; 5 A. L. J. 1 (P. C.); 35 I. A. 1; 17 M. L. J. 605, referred to Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—The sapindas of the full blood should be preferred to those of the half blood. A person claiming both through a male and a female is to be preferred to one who claims through the male only.

Therefore, where of the three claimants to the estate of a propositus, who are related in the same degree to him as being the great-grandsons of his grandfather, the two are sapindas of the full blood while the third is that of a half-blood, those of the full blood have preference over that of the half blood.

Unless apt language has been employed suggesting a surrender and a re-grant, Courts should be slow to spell them out from stray recitals in documents.

A surrender by a widow of her estate to be valid must be of the whole of the property.

In case of an alienation by a widow with the consent of the reversioners, Courts are bound to presume the validity of an alienation when the next reversioner consents to it, until it is rebutted by clear and cogent evidence.

But such a presumption does not arise when a reversioner accepts a deed of conveyance in his own favour.

Per Kumaraswami Sastri, J.—The consent of a reversioner to a widow's alienation is only evidence of the necessity or propriety. An alienation would not, as against reversioners other than those that consent, confer an indefeasible title to the alienee apart from any question of necessity or propriety, unless such an alienation can be supported on the doctrine of surrender or estoppel.

A mere assent of one who would be the heir if a widow died at that moment, would not entitle the widow to make alienations at her pleasure or squander the estate.

The doctrine of validation by assent is founded on the doctrine that a person may well be presumed not to act against his interest.

Where, therefore, a person who would be entitled to avoid a transaction unless certain conditions are satisfied, assents to it to his prejudice, the safe inference to draw is that the conditions existed.

In a case of surrender of partial alienation the consent must be bona fide and not a devise for the purpose of enlarging the widow's estate.

The assent of the reversioner has a double aspect, not merely raising a presumption, but also raising an estoppel, against the person assenting even though he might not have received any consideration or benefit.

Where an alienation is sought to be supported on the ground of consent, there is no distinction between gift and other transfers.

Bakhtawar v. Bhagwana, 5 Ind. Cas. 270; 7 A. L. J. 121; 32 A. 176; Abdulla v. Ram Lal, 12 Ind. Cas. 601; 8 A. L. J. 13 8; 34 A. 129; Umarao Kunwari v. Sheo Mangal Singh, 24 Ind. The widow and the next reversioner do not represent the entire inheritance and cannot deal with it as effectively as if the inheritance devolved on the next male heir.

It is not necessary that the assent or ratification on the part of the next reversioner should be before or at the date of alienation. It is enough if he ratifies the transaction.

Appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent against the judgments of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Miller and the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar, dated the 3rd March 1913, in Appeal No. 6 of 1910, reported as 20 Ind. Cas. 304, preferred against the decree of the District Court of Salem, in Original Suit No. 13 of 1908.

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar, for the Appellant:—My contention is two-fold: I say (1) that the document is a surrender by a widow of her life-estate in the part alienated, and such surrenders are valid; (2) if it is held that such partial surrenders are not valid in law, my argument is that the alienation being to the immediate reversioner, it is tantamount to consent, and such consents validate the alienation. There is a grant and re-grant to the widow. The reversioner need not consent to the widow being in possession.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—You put it on the ground of partition?]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—If the widow surrenders the whole estate to a third person with the consent of the reversioner it is a surrender of the whole estate.

[KUMARASWAMI SASTRI, J.—In that case, any alienation with the consent of the next reversioner is for the time being valid.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—As to surrender and re-grant, see Bijoy Gopal Mukerjee v. Girindra Nath Mukerjee (1) and Adaikka Maistry v. Muthusami Ambalagaran (2).

In Rangappa Naik v. Kamti Naik (3) there was a document.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—In that case, a document was taken from the reversioner and that is a different case.]

[WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—Have you got any case in which the English doctrine of surrender has been imported into India?]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—In Kattamoody Raghupathy v. Kattamoody Kannamma (4), there is also another case.

[WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—All these are put on the doctrine of merger.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—A distinction exists between surrender of the life-interest and alienation.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—This was simply a notion of Hindu Law which by subsequent decision has ceased to be such.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—In Karetti Brahmanaikudu v. Kareti Mahalakshmi (5) the widow transferred the entire estate as a part of the transaction, some portion of the property being given to her.

In Challa Subbiah Sastri v. Palury Pattabhiramayya (6) Justice Sankaran Nair adheres to his view in Rangappa Naik v. Kamti Naik (3).

In Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7) there were isolated independent acts of alienation by the widow at different times and though assent was given, it was given to each alienation.

This doctrine of assent is founded upon the case of Collector of Masulipatam v. Cavaly Vencata Narrainapah (8). Judgment of Allahabad High Court analysed Consent per se validates the alienation consent based upon surrender validates the same.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The principle is that the consent of the reversioner validates the alienation and there are three modes by which such consent may be expressed.]

[WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—So far the view that it is the consent that validates the alienation, do you mean to say that the Allahabad High Court do not attach any distinction between total or partial alienation ?]

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7) is not an authority for holding the surrender to be valid].

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—Pulin Chandra Mandal v. Bolai Mandal (9) is.

[WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—Where there is a surrender, there is no question of consent.]

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—On bare principles of Hindu Law a partial surrender can never be upheld.]

Mr. A Krishnaswami Aiyar.—Suppose she retains something for her maintenance.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—May be a good arrangement.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—Suppose she retains some interest herself.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—Its validity may be open to question as a mere surrender.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—It is difficult to say where the limits are to be assigned.

In Pulin Chandra Mandal v. Bolai Mandal (9) there is a partial surrender, i.e., half the entire property in favour of immediate reversioner.

In Behari Lal v. Madho Lal Ahir Gayawal (10) the ekrarnamah was in the nature of a testamentary disposition and the widow reserved a life-interest for herself. The Privy Council held that it was not valid.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—According to your argument there is no distinction between a gift and alienation for consideration.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—There is no difference whatever.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—That is rather a strong proposition. Do you say that there is no case of Privy Council which says that a reversioner can give his consent to a gift by a widow ?]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—Hemchunder Sanyal v. Sernamoyee Debi (11) was referred to in Pulin Chandra Mandal v. Bolai Mandal (9).

[KUMARASWAMI SASTRI, J.—In Nobokishore Sarma v. Harinath Sarma (12) it is the whole estate that was surrendered].

M. A. Krishnaswamy Aiyar.—In Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7), read with Behari Lal v. Madho Lal Ahir Gayawal (10), both partial surrenders and partial alienations are valid.

[WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—Then you do not base your future argument on surrender?]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—The second point is that the alienation is not binding upon the reversioner. It is merely voidable by the reversioner. It is open to him to elect to stand by it. It is good until it is avoided. The particular person that assents to it cannot avoid it.

[WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—How do you make out the title by estoppel ?]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—In Rup Narain v. Gopal Devi (13), it is said that where the father himself is estopped the son is so. The case in Modhu Sudan Singh v. E. G. Rooke (14) clearly points out that it is open to the reversioner to elect to stand by it if it is not valid.

[WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—That is a case where the reversioner recovered rent after the widow's death. It does not refer to any consent.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—In Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Srimati Krishna Mahishi Debi (15), the suit was for possession after the death of the widow.

Chinnaramier (16) there is a similar question.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar.—In Kuppier v. Kotta Chinnaramier (16) the question is whether the widow is entitled to an assent from the nearest reversioner. Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7).

In Rangappa Naik v. Kamti Naik (3), Sankaran Nair, J., approves the case in Nobokishore Sarma Roy v. Hari Nath Sarma Roy (12).

In Muthuveeru Mudaliar v. Vythilinga Mudaliar (17) the Judges say that the actual parties are bound.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—But that is a clear case of estoppel].

In Ramkrishna v. Tripurabai (18) there is no question of consent, it is enough if he consents to stand by.

In Mallik Saheb Abdul Saheb Gandigiwad v. Mallikarjunappa (19) a similar view is taken though no consideration was received.

(3) This is a family arrangement between the widow and the nearest reversioner. Rup Narain v. Gopal Devi (13).

(4) My next point is as to the share to which the plaintiff and the first defendant are entitled.

The principle is "to the nearest sapinda, the inheritance belongs."

The rule is worked out by saying that the nearer line excludes the more remote and this is the rule laid down by the Mitakshara. But the principles on which distinction is made between half brother and full brother is not clear.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The principle of nearness of heirship is that larger particles appear in the nearer heir than in the remote heirs.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar referred to Chapter II, s. 3, pl. 3, 5; s. 4, pl. 2, 4; s. 6, pl. 1, 3; s. 2, pl. 6, Mitakshara.

Association with religious rights makes her nearer sapinda.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—Suppose we hold that there is a general statement of preference of full blood, then you have no question.]

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar referred to Chapter XI, section 5, of Smriti Chandrika, placitum 4.

In Chapter XI, section 4, the distinction between half brother and full brother is pointed out.

Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Respondent was not called to argue as to validity of surrender of a part of an estate. As to the full and half blood, see Vallabha Valiya Raja v. Vedapurati (24).

The Mitakshara does not give a list of heirs but only an indication of the principle and gives the names of a few heirs.

As to the construction of the document, unless fiction is adopted, the construction which the appellant wishes to have cannot have any effect.

If it is a partial surrender, it must be complete. Batak Nath v. Munni Dei (25); Raj Lukhee Dabee v. Gokool Chunder Chowdhry (26); Sri Mahant Govind Rao v. Sita Ram Kesho (27).

This Letters Patent Appeal coming on for hearing on the 5th, 6th and 7th October 1914 respectively, and having stood over for consideration till this day, the Court delivered the following

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—I agree with the learned Judges as to the rest of the case and will only deal with the point on which they differed. The question is as to certain alienations made by the mother of the last male owner in 1893 by Exhibit I in favour of Ramasami Gounden who was at that time the nearest reversioner. He predeceased the lady, and on his death his two nephews, the 1st defendant and a brother since deceased and the present plaintiff, a Dayadi of theirs, became the next reversioners; and in this state of things in 1896 the present plaintiff purchased from the 1st defendant and his brother two of the items which had been conveyed to Ramasami Gounden under Exhibit I, and advanced Rs. 8,000 to them on a mortgage, Exhibit III, of a third item, which the 1st defendant sold in 1907 by Exhibit IV to the 3rd defendant from whom, as recited in Exhibit IV, he had borrowed money on mortgage to pay off the plaintiff's mortgage. The defendants pleaded among other things that the plaintiff had acquiesced in, and consented to, the alienations, and that by his subsequent dealings with the properties so alienated he was estopped from questioning them. These contentions formed the subject-matter of the 2nd and 3rd issues. Very little evidence was tendered on them at the trial and the 1st defendant apparently contented himself with filing by consent Exhibit I, the deed of alienation, dated the 24th November 1893, Exhibit II, the sale-deed, under which the plaintiff purchased two of the items included in Exhibit I on the 7th December 1896, and Exhibit III of the same date under which he took a mortgage of another item for Rs. 8,000 from the 1st defendant and his brother, and Exhibit IV, the sale-deed to the 3rd defendant. On this evidence the District Judge was of opinion that it did not show that the plaintiff had assented to the alienations under Exhibit I or was estopped from questioning them. He observed that the alienations under Exhibit I were good for the life of the widow who survived for ten years, and that all the plaintiff acquired under them from the 1st defendant and his brother was a temporary interest of uncertain duration. On appeal, Miller, J., was of opinion that, even if there was consent by the nearest reversioners to partial alienations, that would not render them valid and that there was no estoppel; while Sadasiva Aiyar, J., appears to have considered that the plaintiff's conduct showed that he assented to all the alienations effected by Exhibit I, and that the effect of the decision of their Lordships in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7) was to render partial alienations valid when effected with the consent of the next reversioner.

Now, in the first place, I am not satisfied on the evidence that the conduct of the plaintiff in subsequently purchasing two of the items and advancing money on mortgage of another can be regarded as consent with regard to all other items covered by Exhibit I. It seems to me, however, that it does show consent with regard to the three items which were the subject of the sale and mortgage and, as the items purchased are already in possession of the plaintiff, it will be sufficient to deal with the question as regards the mortgage. As to this I cannot agree with the conclusion of the District Judge that, in taking the mortgage from the 1st defendant and his brother, the plaintiff, who by that time had become their co-reversioner, dealt with them merely as holders of a temporary interest of uncertain duration limited to the life-time of Marakammal, the mother of the last male owner, Exhibit III states that the mortgagors were hypothecating to the plaintiff the mitta which Ramasami Gounden acquired as a gift from Marakammal and which was in their possession and enjoyment, and that the plaintiff had advanced them Rs. 8,000 upon it. The net income of this item is given in the plaint as Rs. 550, and it seems to me that in making this large advance to the mortgagors on the security of this property the plaintiff clearly dealt with the mortgagors as full owners and must be taken to have recognised them as such. He must have known perfectly well that he was one of the next reversioners, and it was not suggested in evidence that he did not know. The recital also shows that he was perfectly well aware of the way in which the mortgagors had acquired the property. Here I may remark that though Exhibit I purports to be for consideration the District Judge states that this contention was abandoned at the trial, and it would, therefore, appear that in Exhibit III it was correctly described as a gift.

In these circumstances I cannot but regard his action in taking the mortgage as consenting to the alienation of this item by Marakammal and recognising the mortgagors' title to it. It must be borne in mind that the alienation by Marakammal was not void but only voidable according to the ruling of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Bijoy Gopal Mukerje v. Krishna Mahishi Debi (15). It may be that a man who takes a deed is not ordinarily bound by statements contained in it, but having regard to the fact that it was open to the plaintiff in his character of next reversioner of the last male owner to avoid or recognise the gift made by Marakammal, I think his conduct in taking a mortgage of the property, which was the subject of the gift, from the representatives of the donee was a representation to persons afterwards dealing with the property, whether as transferees of his mortgage or purchasers, that he was satisfied as to the transaction and did not propose to question it as next reversioner. The recitals in Exhibit IV, the subsequent sale-deed by the 1st defendant, the surviving mortgagor, to the 3rd defendant, show that the 3rd defendant relied on the plaintiff's conduct in taking Exhibit II and Exhibit III when he advanced money on mortgage to the 1st defendant to pay off the plaintiff and got the plaintiff's discharged mortgage as one of his title-deeds, and when subsequently he became the purchaser of the mortgaged property under Exhibit IV. In these circumstances I think the plaintiff is estopped from now questioning the alienation by Marakammal of this item, and that to this extent the third issue must be found for the defendants and the appeal so far be allowed.

I do not consider it necessary to express any opinion on the question whether a gift to the kindred of the last male owner, as distinct from an alienation for consideration, could be validated by the consent of the next reversioner, as the question was not fully argued before us. As regards the question whether the effect of the consent of the next reversioner to an alienation is conclusive or merely evidence of propriety, I agree with Sadasiva Aiyar, J., that the decision of their Lordships in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7) is authority for the former view, and will only remark that that was a case of partial alienations only, because as pointed out in the arguments before us and as appears from the report in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7), the suit was to recover not only the immoveable properties alienated by the widow but also other moveable properties alleged to form part of the estate, and it was nowhere suggested, either in argument or in the judgments of the High Court and the Privy Council, that the properties alienated formed the whole of the estate or that this fact would influence the result. This is important with reference to the authority of the judgment of the majority of the Court in Rangappa Naik v. Kamti Naik (3), because the judgment of the learned Chief Justice appears to have proceeded on the view that in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7) the whole of the estate had been alienated with the consent of the next reversioner, which was not the fact. Since then a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court has held in Debi Prosad Chowdhry v. Golap Bhagat (28) that consent is only evidence of the propriety of the transaction, and their Lordships of the Judicial Committee, in a case in which this decision was cited, let fall certain observations which are relied on by the respondents as supporting the same view, but the precise point did not arise nor were the observations necessary for the decision. In the result, I think the appeal should be allowed as regards the 1st item in the plaint and otherwise dismissed and that the appellant and the 1st respondent should pay and receive proportionate costs throughout.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The last male owner of the properties in dispute was one Ramasami Gounden. On his death, his mother Marakammal succeeded to them. By Exhibit I, dated the 24th of November 1893, she gave away some of the properties to one Ramasami Gounden, who was the immediate reversioner to her son's estate at the time. This donee pre-deceased Marakammal who died in August 1907. At her death, the undoubted heirs were the plaintiff and the 1st defendant. The 3rd defendant also claimed the property on the ground that he stood in the same degree of relationship to the last male owner as the plaintiff and the 1st defendant.

The case for the plaintiff is that the deed of gift is not binding on him and that he is entitled to a half share in the properties of Ramasami Gounden. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 (the 2nd being the son of the 1st) contend that the deed of gift operates as a surrender of Marakammal's estate, that it was assented to by the plaintiff and that, therefore, it is not open to him to question it. The 3rd defendant disputes the right of the plaintiff to a half share and claims a third share for himself. He sold his share to the plaintiff; consequently the plaintiff will be entitled to 2/3rds of the property if the 3rd defendant is also an heir.

The learned District Judge upheld the plaintiff's claim in all respects. The 1st and 2nd defendants appealed. On their appeal, Mr. Justice Miller was for confirming the decree of the District Judge, Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar was for reversing it: hence this appeal.

The principal points for consideration are:—

(1) Whether Exhibit I is binding on the plaintiff, and

(2) whether the 3rd defendant is a claimant of equal degree with the plaintiff and the 1st defendant.

The first question involves a number of subsidiary questions. Although it was argued first, I shall deal with the second point before dealing with the first.

The facts relating to the second question are not in dispute. Sengottuvela Gounden, the common ancestor of the claimants, married two wives. The 3rd defendant is his great-grandson by the 1st wife. The plaintiff and the 1st defendant are his great-grandsons by the 2nd wife. The last male owner, Ramasami Gounden, was his grandson by the 2nd wife. Thus while all the three claimants are related in the same degree to the last male owner as being the great-grandsons of his grandfather, the plaintiff and the 1st defendant are sapindas of the full blood, while the 3rd defendant is a sapinda of the half blood. The point for determination is whether in this degree of relationship, those of the full blood should be preferred to the one of the half blood.

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar has addressed an elaborate argument to us on the question. This matter has been considered in three reported judgments. Mr. Justice Banerjee, in Suba Singh v. Sarafraz Kunwar (29), held that the sapindas of the full blood should be preferred to those of the half blood. Mr. Justice Ranade, in Vithal Rao v. Ram Rao (30), did not accept this position. Mr. Justice Mookerjee, in Sham Singh v. Kishun Sahai (31), agrees with Mr. Justice Banerjee. It is not, therefore, necessary to discuss the subject in great detail; still having regard to the divergence of judicial opinion above indicated and to the fact that the question is res integra in Madras, it is necessary to state our reasons for the conclusion at which we have arrived.

All the Smriti writers are agreed that the full brother is to be preferred to the half brother:—

"Among brothers, such, as are of the whole blood, take the inheritance in the first instance, under the text before cited. 'To the nearest sapinda, the inheritance next belongs', since those of the half blood are remote through the difference (Matruviprakarshat), the mothers." (Mitakshara, Chapter 11, section 4, placitum 5; vide also the Smriti Chandrika, Chapter XI, section 4, placitum 25, and the Dayabhaga, Chapter XI, section 5, placitum 9.) The Vyavahara Mayukha (see Daya Nirnaya, section VIII, placitum 16) is less favourable to the half brother, in that his place is after the full brother and his son under that law.

The argument of the learned Vakil for the appellant is that whereas an exception is made in the case of half blood brothers, no such differentiation appears in the case of the other half blood relations in the ascending or descending line. The only rule applicable to them is, "To the nearest sapinda, the inheritance next belongs." Consequently the preference to full over half blood has no application to those heirs.

In order to deal with the contention satisfactorily, it is necessary to point out that Vijnaneswara has given reasons in almost every case for the rules of succession which he has prescribed. In preferring the mother to the father, he relies upon the form of the conjunctive compound, matapitram, in which the term mata is placed before pita conformably with the rule which "requires the most revered object to have precedence." In the case of the daughter's son, his reason may be briefly stated as the "putrikaputra" theory. With regard to the wife, he calls to aid the spiritual theory of her being one in body with the husband. There are other reasons given whenever a question of preference has to be explained. It is not necessary to refer to them all.

It is not a necessary inference from these rules that all of them are special in their character and that the author did not intend that any one of them should be treated as indicating a general principle. The more correct view is that while some of the reasons are only applicable to the special cases mentioned, there are others which are of a wider application and from their context and their nature, intended to serve as guides to the exposition of similar positions elsewhere. One illustration of this statement may be given. I have referred to the rule of preference regarding the mother. Later on, in dealing with the succession of bandhus, the author had to decide between the father's kindred and the mother's kindred. He says:—

"Here, by reason of near affinity, the cognate kindred of the deceased himself are his successors, in the first instance; on failure of them, his father's cognate kindred; or if there be none, his mother's cognate kindred. This must be understood to be the order of succession here intended." (The Mitakshara, Chapter II, section 6, placitum 2.)

From this, it is clear that the author does not want to extend the rule of preference which places the mother before the father to the mother's kindred, thereby indicating that the original ground was a special one. It is not an unnatural inference, therefore, to conclude that as no special rule is suggested regarding the full and the half blood in the ascending and the descending lines, the author intended that the general rule of Matrisannikarshat and Matruviprakarshat should apply.

I have examined very carefully the reasons given by Mr. Justice Ranade in Vithal Rao v. Ram Rao (30). I am unable to accept the view that the rule of preference regarding brothers is a special rule. It was pointed out by Mr. Justice Mitter, in Guru Gobind Saha v. Anand Lal Ghose (32), that there are numerous passages in the Dayabhaga in which a particular instance is put down to represent a general principle. This is true of the Mitakshara to a greater degree. Numerous authorities have laid down that the enumeration of heirs in the Mitakshara is only illustrative and not exhaustive. With reference to reasons for a rule of succession also, the same considerations must apply. As pointed out by Mr. Sircar in his "Mimansa Rules of Interpretation", in the case of the Smritis all the four rules of interpretation are applicable, namely, Sruti, Linga, Vakya and Prakarana. With reference to each one of these four principles, commentators have explained that "the suggestive power of words and ideas" should be largely resorted to. In my opinion the rule regarding the full and the half brother is an instance to which the Prakarana principle of interpretation is applicable. Sircar points out that the principle of Prakarana is in substance the principle of Upalak- shana or incidental indication. When Vijnaneswara says that the brothers of the full blood are to be preferred to those of the half blood on the ground of Matruriprakarshat, he introduces a doctrine which by the theory of Upalakshana is applicable to all sapindas of the full and the half blood.

Apart from these considerations, we have to bear in mind that the guiding factor in regulating succession in the Benares School is consanguinity. As Sir Michael Westropp pointed out in Lallubhai Bapubhai v. Mankuvarbai (33), this doctrine is based on the theory that nearness is to be determined by the larger community of corporal particles between the propositus and the heir. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has approved of this proposition in Bai Kesserbai v. Hunsraj Morarji (34). This principle has been re-affirmed by the Committee in the recent case of Ramchandra Martand Waikar v. Vinayak Venkatesh Kothekar (35). If this is the basic principle of succession under the Mitakshara system, there can be no doubt that a person claiming both through a male and a female is to be preferred to one who claims through the male only. Mr. Justice Ranade says that the pratyasatti or propinquity theory of the Mitakshara has different meanings in different places. I am unable to agree in this view. This theory is availed of by Vijnaneswara whenever special considerations do not apply. The Smritis in most cases only collate the usages of the people. Vijnaneswara has not been content simply to catalogue them. He has attempted to find out the reason for each of the observances. It is not right to impute to him that his rules of succession are based on different views of propinquity. Wherever he invokes that principle, he is consistent and clear; but where he is obliged to depart from it because of the conscience of the people being against it, he tries to justify the departure by special reasons. I do not think that there is good ground for holding that the Mitakshara understands pratyasatti in different senses.

Moreover, there is greater mutuality of spiritual offerings between the propositus and a full blood sapinda than between him and a half blood sapinda. It is true that Vijnaneswara does not give great importance to spiritual offerings in fixing the position of the heir, but where this ground is not opposed to the theory of propinquity by blood, there is no reason for ignoring this consideration altogether. It may also be pointed out that the author of Saraswathi Vilasa who criticises in a very outspoken manner some of the conclusions of Vijnaneswara, speaks of this rule of preference between brothers of the full and half blood as a very good one. If we remember that this sentence follows a number of diverse comments upon the grounds assigned by the Mitakshara, it is clear that the Saraswathi Vilasa regarded this one as sound in principle and as having a general application.

Mr. Justice Mookerjee has given excellent reasons for holding that the author of the Madana Parijata correctly expounds the view of Mitakshara regarding full and half blood sapindas. The author says:—"In default of the paternal grandfather, paternal uncles succeed in the same way as brothers in default of the father. Even here the relative position of brothers of full and of half blood is the same: the sons of the paternal grandmother take the inheritance first and in their default the sons of the co-wives of the paternal grandmother." There is no force in Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar's contention that the author did not intend to extend the application of the principle to other sapindas of the half blood.

Under the Dayabhaga system, all relations of the full blood are preferred to those of the half blood of equal degree. [See Rajkishore Lahoory v. Gobind Chunder Lahoory and Rammoney Dossee v. Gobind Chunder Lahoory (36).] The Privy Council in Sheo Soondary v. Pirthee Singh (37) has approved of this proposition; Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Vithal Rao v. Ram Rao (30), it may be pointed out, rests his decision on the principle of stare decesis. Although it is almost inexplicable that the full blood should rank equally with the half blood in a province where the prevailing authority (the Vyavahara Mayuka) brings the half brother only after the son of the full brother, it was thought inexpedient to upset titles established under the authority of Samat v. Amra (38). No such consideration applies to Madras. The ground of preference over the half blood is in consonance with received notions of the people in this part of India, is founded on the well-known theory of propinquity of blood, and is a logical extension of the rule stated by the Mitakshara regarding brothers. In Muthusami Mudaliyar v. Simambedu Muthukumaraswami Mudaliyar (39) the Judicial Committee seem to have assumed that those of the full blood will be preferred to those of the half blood. I have, therefore, no hesitation in holding that the 3rd defendant is not entitled to rank pari passu with the plaintiff and the 1st defendant as heir to the estate of the deceased last male owner, Ramasami Gounden.

The main question relates to the validity of Exhibit I. Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar's first contention is that the language of the document imports a surrender by the widow of all her rights in her son's property, the retention by the surrenderee of one portion of it and a re-grant to the widow of the rest. This imaginative process has not been realised by the execution of the necessary documents in that behalf. I am not unmindful of the obvious answer that the Smriti writers had not the Transfer of Property Act in their minds and that if a transaction bears on the face of it the impress that it was a result of considerations germane to Hindu Law, the fact that these considerations have not been carried out by appropriate documents will not prevent the operation of the rule of Hindu Law, although a party seeking possession on the strenght of the transaction may find his title not established. At the same time, it has to be remembered that parties are as familiar with the Hindu Law as they are with the Transfer of Property Act, and unless apt language has been employed suggesting a surrender and a re-grant, Courts should be slow to spell them out from stray recitals in documents. In the present case, the document is by the widow to the nearest reversioner. There is none from the latter to the former. It is true that in Exhibit I, there is a recital that the widow is to enjoy the remaining properties as if she were its absolute owner. I do not think that the language is consistent only with a re-grant to the widow. It is a statement which she herself makes. The observations of Mr. Justice Sankaran Nair in Rangappa Naik v. Kamti Naick (3) relate to a document executed by the reversioner to the widow, where an implication of re-grant would properly arise. They have no bearing on the present case; I, therefore, hold that it has not been proved in this case that the widow surrendered her estate and that there was a re-grant of a portion to her.

The next contention is that the partial surrender by Exhibit I is valid. I think it necessary to state the principles on which a surrender is based under the Hindu Law, before dealing with the specific question. The only text is that of the Dayabhaga:—"Therefore those persons who are exhibited in a passage above cited as the next heirs on failure of prior claimants, shall, in like manner as they would have succeeded if the widow's right had never taken effect, equally succeed to the residue of the estate remaining after her use of it, upon the death of the widow in whom the succession had vested. At such time the succession of daughters and the rest is proper, since they confer greater benefits on the deceased than other claimants." (Dayabhaga, Chapter XI, section 1, palacitum 59.) Mr. Justice Mookerjee points out in Debi Prosad Chowdhury v. Golap Bhagat (28) that the above text is "comprehensive enough to include not merely the case of the death of the widow, but all cases where her right ceases." Now the aim of the text is to enable female heirs to divest themselves of the temporal responsibility of managing an estate during their lives, and by surrendering possession and management, to accelerate the succession of the immediate reversioner. That is intended to give relief to her and not to enable her to enter into bargains with expectant heirs. It, therefore, stands to reason that if this object is to be achieved, the whole of the estate should be surrendered. The rule should not be so worked as to place in the hands of the widow a weapon by which she can attain temporal advantages to herself, under the guise of seeking spiritual salvation, and to those whom she favours, at the expense of the heir on whom succession will devolve on her death. It is said that the principle of "surrender" has been grafted from, and is in consonance with, other systems of law and with common sense. Courts should not encourage a mongrel rule of law which, while violating the fundamental conceptions of the system of jurisprudence which it is intended to serve, has not the merit of introducing any well-recognised principle of equity and good conscience from the system from which the rule is borrowed. Fortunately the decided cases up till now do not compel us to extend the doctrine of surrender in this way.

There is the express decision of the Judicial Committee in Behari Lal v. Madho Lal Ahir Gayawal (10) that the surrender must be of the whole of the property if it is to confer title on the next reversioner. Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar's ingenious suggestion that their Lordships only meant to lay down that the widow should not retain any interest for herself in the property surrendered, cannot be accepted. It is true that in Pulin Chandra Mandal v. Bolai Mandal (9) the authority of Behari Lal v. Madho Lal Ahir Gayawal (10) was extended in the direction suggested by the learned Vakil. That decision has been overruled by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Debi Prosad Chowdhury v. Golap Bhagat (28). In Marudamuthu Nadan v. Srinivasa Pillai (40), after a full examination of the authorites, it was laid down that partial surrenders are invalid. I do not think there is anything in Rangappa Naik v. Kamti Naik (3) which supports the contrary conclusion. There is no ground for the suggestion that the pronouncement of any of the learned Judges in that case supports a partial surrender by the widow; nor is Bajrangi Singh v. Manorkarnika Bakhsh Singh (7) an authority for that position. Both principle and authority are against the contention that it is competent to a widow to convey a good title to the property by a partial surrender in favour of the next reversioner. The spirit and letter of the Hindu Law are against it, and I know of no principle of jurisprudence which can lend validity to such a transaction.

If I may say so with respect, the confusion has arisen by mixing up the question of alienation with that of surrender. The latter rests upon a text of Hindu Law and is based upon certain principles which law-givers in this country have recognised both in the case of males and females. The former is a rule of evidence which finds no express sanction in the Smritis. The texts which enjoin to what extent a female heir can alienate property are all collected by Mr. Mayne in paragraph 607. The Judicial Committee have interpreted these texts to mean that "for religious or charitable purposes or those which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband, she has a larger power of disposition than she possesses for purely worldly purposes. To support an alienation for the last she must show necessity." In interpreting this term "necessity", the question of the extent of proof has often cropped up. It has been laid down that the best proof of necessity will be where the next reversioner consents to an alienation by the widow. He is the man most interested in the inheritance. If his assent has been obtained, there is a guarantee that the alienation is justifiable. This rule of evidenee has led to the consideration of the question regarding the nature of the consent. It is now well established that this consent must have been given bona fide. Such a restriction is necessary in order that the immediate reversioner who is old and who sees no prospect of his succeeding to the property, may not deal with the property with intent to prejudice the rights of those who will be actually entitled to it on the death of the widow. I do not think, notwithstanding the obiter dicta of some learned Judges to the contrary, that the assent of the nearest heir has been regarded by the Judicial Committee as anything but a rule of evidence. The decisions bearing on the subject are very fully summarised by the learned Chief Justice of Calcutta in Debi Prosad Chowdhury v. Golap Bhagat(28); if I may say so without presumption, I entirely agree with that lucid summing up and conclusion. The differences in opinion among learned Judges are mostly traceable to the case in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7). That was a case of partial alienation. I do not think this point admits of much doubt. It was by a series of transactions dealing with portions of the estate from time to time that the properties were conveyed. It was not a case of surrender. Sir Andrew Scoble in delivering the judgment of the Committee extracts various passages from previous decisions of the Committee and of the High Courts regarding the "restrictions imposed by the Hindu Law upon the widow's power to alienate." The quotation from Collector of Masulipatam v. Cavaly Vencata Narainapah (8) stops at the exact point where their Lordships deal with the proof of necessity. The remaining portion is very material, as indicating the view of the Judicial Committee on this subject. They say: "But it surely is not the necessary or logical consequence of this latter proposition that in the absence of collateral heirs to the husband, or on their failure, the fetter on the widow's power of alienation altogether drops. The exception in favour of alienation with consent may be due to a presumption of law that where that consent is given, the purpose for which the alienation is made must be proper." This position has been consistently maintained in all the later decisions. Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7) does not refer to another case before the Privy Council, Sham Sundar Lal v. Achhan Kunwar (41). In this latter case, their Lordships say that the consent must be such "as to raise the presumption that the transaction was a fair one or one justified by Hindu Law." The judgment in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7) proceeds to say that "the principle being thus admitted by the High Courts in India, the question of the quantum of consent necessary only remains;" the admitted principle being that an alienation by a limited owner may be justified on the ground of necessity. This pronouncement is no authority either for the position that partial surrenders are valid or for the contention that the assent of the reversioner is anything more than presumptive evidence of ustifiable alienation. I must now refer to Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Girindra Nath Mukerji (1), which was subsequent to the Calcutta Full Bench decision and which places the meaning of assent by a reversioner beyond controversy. Their Lordships say with reference to the assent of the nearest reversioners that "as against them, it is a fair inference from their conduct that they believed that the arrangement had been made in good faith, and under such circumstances of necessity as would give it validity according to Hindu Law, and as it has always been a feature of Hindu Law as administered by this Board to attach great weight to the sanction by expectant reversioners of an alienation of property by a Hindu woman as affording evidence that the alienation was under circumstances which rendered it lawful and valid, their Lordships in this case consider that the conduct of the appellants themselves during those years affords evidence upon which the respondents are entitled to rely." I must regard this dictum as setting the controversy on this point at rest. To put it at the highest, Courts shall presume (to use the language of the Evidence Act) from the consent of the reversioners that the alienation was justifiable. Although I am inclined to think that it is a presumption of fact and not one of law, still the extent to which the principle has been pushed leads to the inference that the Courts are bound to presume the validity of an alienation when the next reversioner consents to it, until it is rebutted by clear and cogent evidence. Holding this view, I must dissent from the decisions which lay down that such a consent furnishes irrebuttable proof of necessity. I have referred at some length to this question because Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar holds "that a partial alienation by a widow to the nearest reversioner is valid in law when he is a male and gives him full ownership right in the alienated property."

In the present case, the so-called surrender was to the next reversioner. So no question of the consent of the immediate reversioner at the date of the alienation arises, unless it can be argued that a man who takes a gift of property consents to the disposition in his favour. But as I pointed out above, the consent must be of a character to raise the presumption of necessity. It would do violence to legal conceptions to argue that any presumption of such a nature can arise when a man accepts a deed of conveyance in his own favour. Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar realised this and asked us to support the transaction on the ground that, as it was assented to by the plaintiff who was entitled to the property in case the immediate reversioner died, his conduct precluded him from contesting the validity of the transfer evidenced by Exhibit I.

(41) 25 I. A. 183; 21 A. 71; 2 C. W. N. 729; 7 Sar. P. C. J. 417.

This takes me to the consideration of the last question argued in this case. That facts relating to this aspect of the case are these. After the transfer of the properties under Exhibit I to the then next reversioner, Ramasami Gounden, and after his death, the two sons of his undivided brother, Nachiappa Gounden, of whom the 1st defendant alone is now alive, sold to the plaintiff on the 7th December 1896 by Exhibit II some of the properties covered by Exhibit I. On the same date the same persons mortgaged to the plaintiff by Exhibit III other properties included in the surrender deed. Marakammal was alive at this time. Both Exhibits II and III refer to the deed of gift she executed to Ramasami Gounden. The question for determination is, whether the conduct of the plaintiff in taking the sale-deed and the deed of mortgage prevents him from seeking to recover the properties covered by these two documents.

On this question I have had the advantage of a consultation with the learned Chief Justice since the case was argued. I agree in the conclusion at which he has arrived. The 3rd defendant in this case must be deemed to be a stranger. The sale to him by the 1st defendant was to pay off the mortgage-money due to the plaintiff. It is most likely that the 3rd defendant was induced to take the conveyance because he found that the plaintiff, who with the 1st defendant were the nearest reversioners had advanced moneys on the mortgage. It is open to argument that the 3rd defendant had the same means of knowledge as the plaintiff had, and consequently the plaintiff cannot be said to have been estopped. I would have, therefore, preferred to have sent down an issue to the lower Court on the question. But seeing that both the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Kumaraswami Sastri are inclined to hold that the evidence on record is sufficient to decide the point, I do not like to dissent from that conclusion. I, therefore, agree in the order proposed by the learned Chief Justice.

KUMARASWAMI SASTRI, J.—The 2nd defendant is the appellant. The plaintiff, as one of the reversionary heirs to the estate of the deceased Marakammal, sued for a declaration that the deed of gift, dated the 24th November 1893, executed by Marakammal in favour of Ramasami Gounden, her husband's brother's son, is invalid and not binding on him and for partition and delivery to him of a half share of the estate.

Various defences were raised, but for the purpose of this appeal it is only necessary to consider those relating to the validity of the deed of gift and to the claim of the 3rd defendant to a share along with the plaintiff and the 1st defendant. It is sought to support the alienation on the grounds (1) that it amounted to a surrender of the estate by the widow and to a re-grant which vested in the widow and the alienee absolute title in the property each held, (2) that it was a family settlement bona fide entered into between the widow and the next reversioner, (3) that the consent of the next presumptive reversioner validated the alienation and (4) that plaintiff cannot dispute its validity as he consented to the alienation, acquiesced in it and waived all objections by purchasing two of the items and taking a mortgage of the third. It is also argued that the distinction between sapindas of the whole and those of the half blood does not extend beyond the case of brothers and the sons of brothers.

The District Judge held that the deed of gift was invalid as against the plaintiff and that the 3rd defendant was excluded by the plaintiff and 1st defendant. An appeal was preferred to the High Court. Mr. Justice Miller was for holding that the alienation was invalid and that the 3rd defendant was excluded by the plaintiff and the 1st defendant. Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar, while agreeing with Mr. Justice Miller as to the 3rd defendant being excluded, was for upholding the alienation.

The following table sets out the relation-

Marakammal succeeded as heir to her son Ramasami Gounden, who died issueless in the year 1890. The next reversioner was Ramasami Gounden, her husband's brother's son, and she executed in his favour the deed of gift, Exhibit I, which is now sought to be declared to be invalid. It is dated the 24th November 1893 and the material part runs as follows :—" As you have performed the funeral rites to my husband, the deceased Ardhanari Gounden, and my son, the deceased Ramasami Gounden, as you have the right to inherit as surviving heir all my properties after my death, as you have spent on my behalf and on behalf of my son your own (moneys) and after borrowing moneys required for conducting Original Suit No. 5 of 1883 on the file of the District Court of Salem, conducted by my son, the deceased Ramasami Gounden, as plaintiff, and all other civil and criminal proceedings in connection therewith in other Courts, as I am advanced in age and unable to supervise and manage the mitta and other lands and to collect the amounts due on the hypothecation debt bonds, and as you have consented to my possession and enjoyment with all rights and interests of all the properties, other than those mentioned below, which belong to me under the razinama decree in Original Suit No. 5 of 1883 on the file of the District Court of Salem and which I am enjoying and of which I make a gift to you, and as you have promised to support me during my life-time at your expense and to have the marriage of my unmarried daughter performed according to our custom and to perform also seeru and serappu for this and to another daughter who has been married, I have made a gift of the undermentioned properties valued at about Rs. 10,000 to you who is the elder brother's son of my husband, deceased Ardhanari Gounden, and delivered possession to you. Therefore you shall in comfort possess and enjoy the undermentioned properties from generation to generation and with powers to give away by gift, sale, etc. I have no manner of right or interest over the said gift properties."

I do not think that this document can be construed to be in effect one whereby the widow surrendered the whole of her estate to the reversioner and got back a portion with absolute powers of disposal. Far from the surrender of the whole estate the document recites that the widow was to have absolute powers over the properties not given to the reversioner. It merely evidences an arrangement whereby the reversioner in consideration of getting certain items of property consents to the widow enjoying the rest of the properties absolutely. There is no evidence of any arrangement whereby the widow agreed to surrender the entire estate to the reversioner and subsequent to the surrender get back a portion of the estate by a conveyance from the reversioner, and I do not think that any such arrangement can be inferred merely because the document recites that the donee agreed to the donor enjoying the remaining property with absolute rights. Nor is there any evidence that it was in pursuance of any family arrangement necessary and beneficial to the estate, so as to make it binding on reversioners who do not claim under the reversioner who was alienee.

It is argued by the appellant's Vakil that even though there might not have been an absolute surrender of the entire estate, there was a surrender of that portion which was covered by the deed, Exhibit I, and that all that the law requires is that the widow should not retain an interest in the portion given to the reversioner. Reference has been made to Kanu Ram Deb v. Kashi Chandra Sharma Chowdhury (42) and Pulin Chandra Mandal v. Bolai Mandal (9). In considering this aspect of the case, I think it is necessary to keep in mind the distinction between a surrender of the estate by the widow to the next reversioner, whereby the widow accelerates the succession by withdrawing her interest in the property, she treating herself as civilly dead so as to open up the inheritance in favour of the next reversionary heir; and (2) in an alienation of a part of the estate which is made with the consent of the next reversionary heir. So far as I can see there is, except in Bengal, very little authority for treating the reversioner's power to validate an alienation as derived from the ordinary power to accelerate the succession.

So far as the doctrine of surrender is concerned, there is no express authority to be found for it either in the Smritis or in the Mitakshara. The text of Katyana, accepted by all the commentators as authoritative, expressly states that the widow is to enjoy the estate of her husband with moderation until her death and that after her the husband's heirs should take it. An anticipation of interest involved by the theory of relinquishment or a defeasance of ulterior interests by intermediate or premature acts on the part of the widow is hardly contemplated by the Smritis. As pointed out by Sircar, the rule probably originated from the doctrine that the retirement from the world or the extinction of one's desire for property is according to Hindu Law civil death and causes in the same way as natural death the extinction of her rights in property and has the effect of accelerating the inheritance. The theory of acceleration of the estate by surrender by the widow has been evolved by the Calcutta High Court from the Dayabhaga of Jumutavahana, and a long series of decisions established the rule that it was open to the widow to surrender her widow's estate to the next presumptive reversioner, so as to vest the full estate in him as effectually as if he had succeeded to the estate on her death. The doctrine of acceleration by surrender, though it finds no express support from the Smritis, has been placed beyond all doubt by the decision of the Privy Council in Behari Lal v. Madho Lal Ahir Gayawal (10), but it is clear that their Lordships expressly made it a condition precedent that her own life-interest had to be withdrawn so that "the whole estate should be vested at once in the grantee." In Marudamuthu Nadan v. Srinivasa Pillai(40) the Full Bench of the Madras High Court held that the alienation, to be operative as a surrender, should be absolute and complete and that the whole limited estate should be withdrawn. In Rangappa Naik v. Kamti Naik (3) their Lordships were of opinion that a transfer, to be valid as a surrender, should be one whereby the whole estate of the widow was extinguished. It is argued that the decision of the Privy Council in Bajrangi Singh v. Mankornika Bakhsh Singh (7) has extended the doctrine of accelera tion by surrender even to surrenders of part of the estate, provided that the surrender is absolute as to the part surrendered, but reading the judgment I am unable to find any passage where the express direction of the Privy Council in Behari Lal v. Madho Lal Ahir Gayawal (10), that the surrender to be valid should be of the whole estate, is questioned or modified. On the contrary their Lordships of the Privy Council cite the judgment of Justice Subramania Iyer in Marudamuthu Nadan v. Srinivasa Pillai (40), where he refers to the effect of the decision in Behari Lal v. Madho Lal Ahir Gayawal (10), as requiring that the surrender should be absolute and complete and that the whole estate should be withdrawn, with approval and observe at the end of the judgment that their Lordships would be unwilling to extend the widow's powers of alienation beyond its present limits. Their Lordships in Behari Lal's case (10) observe that "the necessity of the removal of the obstacle of the life-estate is a practical check on the frequency of such conveyances", and it would require very strong authority to hold that the salutary check has been subsequently removed by the Privy Council. In Kangappa Naik v. Kamti Naik (3) his Lordship, the Chief Justice, was of opinion that the reservation as to the surrender being of the entire estate, which is expressly laid down by the Privy Council in Behari Lal's case (10), was not affected by the judgment of the Privy Council in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7). Mr. Justice Sankaran Nair was also of the same opinion (see his observations at page 380). A similar view was also taken by the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Debi Prosad Chowdhury v. Golap Bhagat (28). I am of opinion that the rule requiring the surrender of the entire widow's estate to be necessary to validate an alienation on the ground of surrender, which was clearly laid down by the Privy Council in Behari Lal's case (10) and by the Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Marudamuthu Nadan v. Srinivasa Pillai (40), is not affected by the decision of the Privy Council in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7).

It is argued by the appellant's Vakil that apart from the question of surrender, the alienation is valid as it was with the consent of the next reversioner. The contention is that the alienation would have been valid if it had been made to a stranger with the consent of the next reversioner and that there is no reason why it should not be equally valid if made to the next reversioner himself, who must be deemed to have consented to an alienation in his favour. This contention raises the question as to the effect of the consent of the next reversioner. Does consent per se validate an alienation which could not otherwise be supported, or is it only evidence of the propriety of the alienation? This question has been fully discussed and considered by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Debi Prosad Chowdhury v. Golap Bhagat (28) and I have no hesitation in agreeing with the conclusions arrived at, that consent is only evidence of the necessity or propriety and that the alienation by the widow with the consent of the reversioner would not as against reversioners other than those that consent, confer an indefeasible title to the alienee, apart from any question of necessity or propriety, unless such an alienation can be supported on the doctrine of surrender with the limitation laid down in Behari Lal's case (10) or estoppel.

The effect of assent by the reversioners has been discussed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in several cases and it has been treated as evidence of necessity, and not as something that of itself validates an invalid alienation. I need only refer to Collector of Masulipatam v. Cavaly Vencata Narrainapah (8); Raj Lukhee Dabee v. Gokool Jhunder Chowdhry (26); Sham Sundar Lal v; Achhan Kunwar (41) and Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Girindra Nath Mukerji (1). Nothing can be clearer than the following observations in Raj Lukhee Debee's case (26): "Their Lordships do not mean to impugn those authorities which lay down that a transaction of this kind may become valid by the consent of the husband's kindred, but the kindred in such case must generally be understood to be all those who are likely to be interested in disputing the transaction. At all events, there should be such a concurrence of the members of the family, as suffices to raise a presumption that the transaction was a fair one, and one justified by Hindu Law. That it can be, as Mr. Field seemed to put it, a presumption of law in the sense of presumptio juris et de jure, their Lordships do not think. It is, no doubt, an element to be taken into consideration and deserving of considerable weight in the estimation of all the evidence of transaction." In their latest pronouncement on the subject in Bjioy Gopal Mukerji's case (1) their Lordships observe: "It has always been a feature of Hindu Law as administered by this Board to attach great weight to the sanction by expectant reversioners of an alienation of property by a Hindu woman, as affording evidence that the alienation was under circumstances which rendered it lawful and valid."

If consent per se validated an alienation, it is difficult to see why their Lordships of the Privy Council should have, in a series of decisions, treated it as evidence of propriety. There can be no question of propriety or necessity when all that is required is the concurrence of the widow and the next reversioner to give a complete title to the alienee.

The Smritis and the commentators thereon do not, in my opinion, sanction the view that the widow and the next reversioner can do what they like with the estate. The text of Katyayana is that she should live under the protection of her elders and enjoy with moderation the property which she got from her husband, and that after her death her husband's heirs should take the property. Brihaspati observes that "she has not got property therein to the extent of gift, mortgage or sale", except for spiritual or religious purposes. What such purposes are appears from the following text of Brihaspati. "With presents offered to his (her husband) manes and by pious liberality, let her honour the paternal uncles of her husband, his spiritual parents and daughter's sons, the children of his sisters, his maternal uncles and also old and unprotected persons guests and females." The position of her husband's kindred is thus defined by Narada: "When the husband is deceased, his kin are the guardians of his childless widow. In the disposal of the property and care of herself as well as her maintenance they have full power." The texts lay down the purposes for which alienations are justified and the power of the kinsmen, who are placed in the position of her guardians, can only be for carrying on the directions in the Smritis as to the proper and appropriate way in which she is to enjoy the estate. Vijnaneswara is silent as to the powers of disposal by a widow with the consent of the husband's kindred, but Jimutavahana says that she is empowered to giyep resents to her husband's sapindas, but not to her own relations if any of her husband's relations are in existence and adds, "with their consent, however, she may also bestow gifts on the kindred of her own father and mother. In the disposal of property by gift or otherwise she is subject to the control of her husband's family."

It is clear that the Smritis never contemplated alienations by a widow except for necessary or spiritual or charitable purposes, and gave her absolute powers in some cases and powers subject to the advice and guidance of her husband's kinsmen in others. There is nothing to justify the conclusion that the mere assent of one who would be the heir if the widow died at the particular moment, would entitle the widow to make alienations at her pleasure or squander the estate on purposes which the Smritis would have emphatically condemned.

I might in passing refer to the distinction sought to be drawn between cases of consent by the next reversioner to alienation for consideration and consent to gifts by the widow. In Bakhtawar v. Bhagwana (43), Abdulla v. Ram Lal (44) and Umrao Kunwari v. Sheo Mangal Singh (45) it was held that the decision of the Privy Council in Bajrangi Singh's case (7) did not apply to gifts. A contrary view was taken by the Madras High Court in Kuppier alias Venkatasubbier v. Kotta Chinnaramier (16) and Kattamoody Raghupathy v. Kattamoody Kannamma (4), where it was held that there was no difference in principle between gifts and transfers for consideration.

If their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down the rule that consent of the reversioner validates an alienation which is otherwise invalid, it is difficult to see what difference it would make if the alienation was for or without consideration. If consent per se validates an alienation, it must be because of the efficacy of the assent and it is difficult to see what difference it would make in principle, if the widow received consideration which she squandered on purposes which cannot, by any stretch of imagination, be said to be necessary or proper It may be that a gift is made to a deserving person or for an object that is praiseworthy. It may be one that has been recommended by the text-writers as a gift which the widow might well make owing to its being conducive to the spiritual welfare of herself or her husband or the material prosperity of his kinsmen. If it were necessary to do so, I would hold that there is no difference between gifts and other transfers, but I do not think the question raised has any direct bearing on the facts of the present case as the deed Exhibit I, though it is called a deed of gift, was really a transfer in consideration of moneys advanced and help rendered in connection with litigation concerning the estate which came to the widow, and also in respect of expenses to be borne in connection with the marriage expenses of the sister of the deceased male holder.

Considered as a rule of evidence, the doctrine of validation by assent is founded on the doctrine that a person may well be presumed not to act against his interest and that where a person who would be entitled to avoid a transaction, unless certain conditions are satisfied, assents to it to his prejudice, the safe inference to draw is that the conditions existed. The effect of the decisions of the Privy Council referred to by me above no doubt gives assent a high evidentiary value but they do not make it conclusive proof. As observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council, it is not a presumption of law in the sense of "presumptio juris et de jure", but its effect is to afford strong corroborative evidence where evidence of necessity is given and to supply the place of such evidence where it is not forthcoming.

I do not think that the decision of the Privy Council in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakksh Singh (7) can be read as overruling all the previous decisions wherein assent was only treated as evidence of necessity. or as laying down the new principle that the widow and the next reversioner or reversioners can do what they like with the estate. Having regard to the series of decisions that limit the widow's powers of disposal and those which put the reversioner's right as a mere spes successions, it is difficult to hold that the widow and the next reversioner represent the entire inheritance and could deal with it as effectively as if the inheritance devolved on the next male heir. As pointed out by the Chief Justice in Debi Prosad Chowdhury v. Golap Bhagat (28) their Lordships of the Privy Council while referring to the doctrines of validity by assent and by surrender, formulated no new principles but only applied doctrines established by prior decision to a novel set of facts. With all deference to the learned Judges, I dissent from the view taken in Kuppier alias Venkatasubbier v. Kota Chinnaramier (46) and Mallik Saheb Abdul Saheb Gandigiwad v. Mallikarjunappa (19) as to the effect of the decision of the Privy Council in Bajrangi Singh's case (7). I am of opinion that Muthuveeru Mudaliar v. Vythilinga Mudaliar (17): Pilu v. Babaji (47); Ramakrishna v. Tripurabai (18) and Debi Prosad Chowdhry v. Golap Bhagat (28) are correctly decided and that the following propositions are deducible from the authorities:—

(1) That an alienation to be valid as to surrender must be of the widow's whole life-estate so as to vest the inheritance at once in the alienee.

(2) That where the alienations is only of a part of the estate, the consent of the next presumptive reversioner is evidence of the necessity or propriety of the alienation and that in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the Court shall presume that the alienation was proper.

(3) That the consent of a reversioner will, if given bona fide and for consideration, estop and bind the reversioner so consenting and those claiming through him apart from any question of necessity or propriety.

(4) That whether it is a case of surrender or partial alienation, the consent must be bona fide and not a device for the purpose of enlarging the widow's estate.

(5) That assent has a double aspect, not merely raising a presumption, but also raising an estoppel against the person assenting, even though he might not have received ny consideration or benefit.

The next point for consideration is whether the alienation by the widow tested by the above rules is binding on the plaintiff. The appellant's Vakil rests his case on estoppel, acquiescence and waiver. There is no dispute as to the facts. After the death of Ramasami Gounden (the alienee from the widow under Exhibit I), the 1st defendant, who was the son of the donee's undivided brother, Nachiappa Gounden, and 1st defendant's brother (now dead) sold to the plaintiff two of the items of property conveyed by the widow under Exhibit I and mortgaged another item to him for Rs. 8,000.

(46) 10 Ind. Cas. 421; 22 M. L. J. 488; 9 M. L. T. 356.

The deed of sale in plaintiff's favour, Exhibit II, recites that the two items were obtained by Ramasami Gounden under the deed of gift and it is not disputed that the deed referred to is Exhibit I. The deed of mortgage which was executed on the same date of the deed of sale (7th December 1896) was for Rs. 8,000, and the only item mortgaged was the mitta (item 1 of the plaint). The mortgage recites that the mitta hypothecated was "the mitta which Ramasami Gounden obtained under a deed of gift from Marakammal." The schedule to the mortgage-deed also describes the property similarly. The property was sold subsequently by the 1st defendant to the 3rd defendant and it appears from the deed of sale that money had been borrowed from the vendee to discharge the mortgage in plaintiff's favour and that the sale was inter alia to discharge the debt so incurred.

When the plaintiff purchased two items of property and got a mortgage of another item (which was the most valuable) for Rs. 8,000, Ramasami Gounden, the donee under Exhibit I, was dead and the plaintiff was one of the next reversioners. The deed of gift, Exhibit I, executed by Marakammal in favour of Ramasami Gounden was not void but was only voidable at plaintiff's option, as ruled by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Krishna Mahishi Debi (15). He was, no doubt, not bound to institute a suit to set it aside, nor was he bound by any overt act to express consent or dissent, but he was certainly bound not to do any act which would reasonably induce third parties to believe that he elected not to avoid the transaction but to affirm it. It is difficult to believe that the plaintiff was not aware of his legal rights and of his rights to dispute the validity of the alienation by the widow. It appears from Exhibit I that Marakammal was 52 years old in 1893 so that she was at the date of Exhibits II and III about 55 years old. The plaintiff's age, as appears from his deposition, was 40 in 1909 so that he was 27 years old in 1896 when he purchased two items and lent money on the third. It is, no doubt, true that the alienation by the widow will be good during her life-time, but it is hardly likely that the next reversioner who was a young man of 27 would have lent Rs. 8,000, when the widow on whose death he would succeed was an old woman of 55 years, merely on the strength of the life-interest. When a reversioner under such circumstances lends a considerable sum on one of the most important items of property alienated by the widow, I think a reasonable and prudent man might infer that he assented to the alienation of that item by the widow. It has, no doubt, been held in Sham Sundar Lal v. Achhan Kunwar (41) that the consent must be shown to have been given with a knowledge of the effect of what one is doing and an intelligent intention to consent to such effect. As regards acquiescence and ratification it has been held in La Banque Jacques Cartier v. La Banque D'Epargne De La Cite Et Du District De Montreal (48) that they must be founded on full knowledge of the facts and must be in relation to a transaction which is valid in itself and not illegal and to which effect may be given as against the party by his acquiescence in, and adoption of, the transaction. The principles as to estoppel are to be found in section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act and section 115 of the Evidence Act. The law is clear, but the difficulty arises in its application to a particular set of facts. When a person lends a large sum of money to another on the security of property treating him as absolutely entitled to the property while, as a matter of fact, his title was only a limited one avoidable at the option of the mortgagee on the widow's death, it is difficult to see on what principle he can turn round and dispute the title of a purchaser who has lent money to pay him off and who to recoup himself has purchased the property.

It is argued that the principles of Hindu Law as to ratification and assent only apply to ratification by the next presumptive reversioner and that same principles cannot be applied where the alienation is by the widow to the next reversioner and that next presumptive reversioner consents. I am unable to see any reason for the distinction. As I have already pointed out, the Hindu Law does not make any distinction between the next and the more remote reversioners or display any preponderating preference for the next heir over another more remote. The texts speak of the husband's kinsmen and the words "paternal uncles" in the text of Brihaspati, where the paternal uncles of her husband are spoken of, has been interpreted to mean the sapindas of her husband. Narada speaks of the husband's kin being the guardians. The rule laid down in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7), that the assent by the next reversioners is enough, is only a practical working rule and cannot be construed to mean that the assent given by remoter reversioners has no legal effect, even though the immediate reversioner is the alienee and his assent or evidence of necessity is of no use.

It is not necessary that the assent or ratification should be before or at the date of the alienation, Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (7); nor is assent required to be in any particular form. Assent might be inferred by attestation, Kuppier alias Venkatasubbier v. Kota Chinnaramier (46); Narayana Aiyar v. Rama Aiyar (21); Chunder Dutt Misser v. Bhagwat Narain Thakur (23): Ismail Jolaha v. Jagannath (22), though as pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Raj Lukhee Dubee's case (26), mere attestation without more does not necessarily import concurrence. It may also be inferred by recitals in other documents or by a course of conduct which leads to the reasonable inference that a person elects to ratify a voidable transaction, Kuppier alias Venkatasubbier v. Kota Chinnaramier (46); Mallik Saheb Abdul Saheb Gandigiwad v. Mallikarjunappa (19); Modhu Sudan Singh v. Rooke (14).

So far as the two items of property purchased by plaintiff are concerned, they were not very valuable and were sold along with other items of property admittedly belonging to the vendor. I do not think that under these circumstances it can be taken as proved beyond doubt that the plaintiff intended to give up his rights as regards all the items of property transferred by the widow under Exhibit I. So far as the mortgage of the mitta under Exhibit III is concerned, I am of opinion that the facts set out by me show that plaintiff must have assented to the alienation. Though Exhibit I purports to be a deed of gift, the recitals show that the alienee had spent his own moneys for a litigation concerning the estate got by the widow (to re-pay which the widow could have borrowed moneys or sold properties so as to bind the reversioners) and agreed to defray the marriage expenses of her daughter, who was the sister of the last male-owner. Assent by the reversioner is strong evidence of the truth of the recitals and shows that it was either necessary or proper. So far as the plaintiff is concerned, I am of opinion that he cannot question Exhibit I in so far as it conveys the mitta item (1) to Ramasami Gounden, both on the ground of estoppel and on the ground of consent or ratification.

The last question is about the exclusion of the reversioners of the half blood by those of the full blood. It will be seen from the genealogical table that Sengottuvela Gounden had two wives and that while the plaintiff, the 1st defendant and the last male owner are descendants of Sengottuvela Gounden by the second wife, the third defendant claims descent through the first wife. It is argued for the appellant that the rule of Hindu Law as to the exclusion of half blood by those for the full blood extends only to brothers and their sons and that there is no reason to apply the doctrine to ascendants. The balance of authority is in favour of the view that the distinction between whole blood and half blood extends to sapinda relations other than the brother and his sons. In Subba Singh v. Sarafraz Kunwar (29) and Sham Singh v. Kishun Sahai (31) their Lordships dissented from the view taken in Samat v. Amra (38) and Vithal Rao v. Rama Rao (30) by the Bombay High Court. Justices Miller and Sadasiva Aiyar, though they differed on other points, agreed in accepting the view taken by the Calcutta and Allahabad High Courts.

The chief argument adduced by the appellant's Vakil is that while the Mitakshara makes mention of the difference between whole and half blood in dealing with the case of brothers and their sons, no such distinction is drawn when other heirs are spoken of. It is also argued that the reasons given by the Mitakshara for fixing the position of what are called the compact heirs are not always consistent and that consequently there is no reason to treat the grounds of inclusion or exclusion as applicable to the other heirs. These arguments lose much of their force when it is remembered that the Mitakshara bases the whole scheme of succession on the well-known text of Manu (Chapter IX, Sloka 187) which has been translated by Colebrooke as "to the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs." Literally translated the line reads as follows: "He who is unremote from sapinda his property becomes his." The Mitakshara treats sapinda relationship as arising from connection with parts of one body, curtailed by the technical limitation that it includes only paternal agnatic relations within the seventh degree. It treats as axiomatic Slokas 186 and 187 of Chapter IX of Manu which run as follows:—"To three must libations of water be made, to three must pinda or oblations of food be presented. The fourth is the giver of these offerings; the fifth has no concern with them. Whoever is unremote from (among) sapinda his property becomes his. After him the Sakulya is the heir, then the preceptor or pupil." In trying to reconcile this principle with the fact that the mother (probably by long usage) was placed before the father while the maternal relations were postponed to the paternal, Vijnaneswara put forward reasons which other commentators did not accept but there can be little doubt that however illogical the grounds might be when applied to particular relations, the basic principle accepted by him was that the inheritance goes to the nearest sapinda. In treating of the mother's rights to succeed in preference to the father he observes as follows:—"Besides the father is a common parent to other sons but the mother is not so and since her propinquity is consequently the greatest, it is fit that she should take the estate conformably with the text. To the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs." In treating of brothers he gives the preference to brothers of the whole blood, his reason being that those of the half blood are remote through the difference of the mother and that, therefore, those of the whole blood should take the inheritance in the first instance conformably to the text of Manu. "To the nearest sapinda the inheritance belongs." In dealing with brothers' sons he states: "On failure of brothers also their sons share the heritage in the order of the respective fathers," and Balambhatta explains this to mean in their order as descended from brothers of the whole or half blood.

So far as I can see, there is no reason for limiting the exclusion of the agnates of half blood by those of the full blood to brothers and their sons, if propinquity is to be the basis on which succession is to be regulated and the text of Manu, "To the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs," is to be treated as of universal application. The Mitakshara, which is a running commentary on the institutes of Yajnavalkya, is known for its brevity, and the repetition of arguments or grounds of exclusion when there is no difference in principle is hardly to be expected. Nor is it exhaustive on matters of succession. The view taken by the Calcutta and Allahabad Hight Courts has the sanction of Visweswara Bhatta, the well-known author of the Madanaparijata, who states that the paternal uncles and other ascendants succeed "on the analogy of brother's sons mentioned in the verse of Yajnavalkya regarding other heirs and that the distinction between the whole blood and the half blood applies to all ascendants. Upalakshana and Lakshana are well-known technical terms in Mimansa and it cannot be said that commentators like Vijnaneswara had not the rules of the Mimansa in mind. Upalakshana is the rule of construction whereby a word is taken to mean, not only a thing denoted by it, but also as meaning and including other things of the same nature. Lakshana is extending the meaning of a word to things connected by analogy. Applying these principles of interpretation and bearing in mind the rule of Manu as to succession by propinquity, there can be little doubt that Vijnaneswara gave the reason for preferring whole to half brothers by way of illustration of a general principle and hardly intended to cut down a rule of general application. I am of opinion that preference based on connection by whole blood applies not only to brothers and their sons but to uncles and their sons and grandsons.

In the result I allow the appeal as regards the mitta item 1 of the property and modify the decree of the lower Court by dismissing plaintiff's suit as regards this item. The parties will pay and receive proportionate costs throughout.

Appeal allowed in part; Decree modified.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 92, applicability of- Dispute between parties as to who is entitled to be mutwalli, suit relating to.

Suits relating to disputes between parties as to who is entitled to be mutwalli on the ground of family relationship are not brought under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code.

First appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Farrukhabad, dated the 19th February 1913.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru (with him Mr. A. Haidar), for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. Abdul Raoof (with him Mr. Gulzari Lal), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.-In this suit, which purports to have been brought under the provisions of section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the plaintiffs claimed that the defendant should be removed from the mutawalliship of certain property, which was specified in lists A and B appended to the plaint, that the defendant should be called upon to furnish accounts and that a new trustee or trustees from the family of the original appropriator (one Wali Ullah) should be appointed. In the plaint are set forth the history of the waqf, about which there appears to be no doubt. One Maulvi Wali Ullah started an Arabic school of literature and Muhammadan jurisprudence in the city of Farrukhabad about the year 1808. He dedicated certain shops, which at present produce about Rs. 22 per mensem, for the expenses. For a long time a man of the name of Syed Fazl Ali was de facto mutwalli. He made a further waqf of property worth about Rs. 7,500. He continued to be at least de facto mutwalli during the remainder of his life and named his son, Inam Ali, to be mutwalli after his death. Inam Ali succeeded Fazl Ali and died on the 5th of February 1908. Fazl Ali, when making his dedication, provided that the descendants of Inam Ali should be the mutwallis of the entire endowment. After the death of Syed Inam Ali, who apparently died without issue, his brother Karamat Ali assumed the mutwalliship. Then followed some litigation, Karamat Ali brought a suit asking for a declaration that he was the lawful mutwalli of all the property. The Court of first instance decided in his favour. The principal plaintiff in the present suit, Syed Ali Raza, was a party. Syed Ali Raza appealed and on the case coming before this Court the suit was withdrawn with liberty to bring a fresh suit. From the judgment it would seem that the Court had indicated that the evidence adduced by Karamat Ali was not sufficient to justify it in making an affirmative declaration in his favour. No fresh suit was apparently brought owing to the death of Karamat Ali. On the death of Karamat Ali, which took place on the 23rd of August 1911, the present defendant, Niamat Ali became mutwalli under the guardianship of his mother, Musammat Tasliman. This was in accordance with a provision in the Will of Karamat Ali. The present suit was then instituted on the 20th of February 1912. It must be noted here that there is no allegation in the plaint that there has been any misappropriation of trust funds or any breach of trust. It is not alleged that any scheme was required. The prayer is simply for the removal of the defendant from the office of mutwalli and that some new trustee or trustees from the family of the original appropriator should be appointed.

The Court below has made a decree removing the defendant from being trustee and has appointed the plaintiff, Syed Ali Raza, mutwalli. It has even given the costs of the suit against the defendant. Section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for a suit for certain reliefs in the Court of the District Judge in a case of an alleged "breach" of a trust created for public purposes of a charitable or religious nature or where the direction of the Court is deemed necessary for the administration of any such trust. Suits relating to disputes between parties as to who is entitled to be mutwalli on the ground of family relationship are not brought under this section. We have already pointed out that no breach of trust was alleged nor proved, nor was it shown in any way that the intervention of the Court was necessary. Assuming that Karamat Ali was legally entitled to be the mutwalli, an office which he undoubtedly de facto enjoyed, he was entitled to appoint his successor. It seems to us that the suit was entirely misconceived and ought not to have been entertained by the learned Judge. It is argued that there was no mutwalli and that the waqf property was derelict, and that accordingly the intervention of the Court was absolutely necessary. This is clearly not so. Karamat Ali was de facto mutwalli, and it was never decided that he was not also de jure so. As a matter of fact it clearly appears that the defendant did assume the office and apparently the trust property was being properly managed. It is said that the defendant Niamat Ali is a minor. It is possible that he was a minor according to the Indian Majority Act, but it is by no means certain that he was a minor according to the Muhammadan Law, that is to say, that he had not reached the years of puberty and discretion. In the Will of Karamat Ali, which was made before the present dispute arose, he is described as being a boy of 16 years of age. On the general merits of the case it seems to us that the present suit has very little. The defendant is the grandson of Fazl Ali, who made the last endowment the most substantial portion of the waqf. Fazl Ali had for many years been at least de facto mutwalli of the endowment created by Wali Ullah, and the presumption would be that he was also de jure mutwalli. According to the spirit of Muhammadan Law Niamat Ali, his grandson, would have the best right to be mutwalli. We need hardly say that if there is a breach of trust in the future, it will be open upon proper proof to get the mutwalli removed and a new trustee appointed.

We allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and dismiss the plaintiffs' suit with costs in both Courts.

JUDGMENT.

SANKARAN NAIR, J.—The plaintiff brought the suit as the assignee of a promissory note executed by the defendant in favour of one Venkatarama Reddi. The Judge has dismissed it on the ground that the consideration is illegal and the plaintiff is not a "holder in due course." The plaintiff appeals.

Venkatarama Reddi's daughter, Venkatalakshmi Ammal, was authorised by her husband to adopt a son. The defendant is her husband's brother's son. Venkatarama Reddi was not willing that his daughter should adopt the defendant. What then happened, according to him, may be described in his own words:—"The 1st defendant went away and came back in 10 days and asked one to intercede with Venkatalakshmi. I said I would do so. He went away and came back in another 15 days. I advised Venkatalakshmi to adopt in case the defendant and his brother brought litigation. On the several occasions the 1st defendant told me he would give me the Rs. 10,000 Venkatalakshmi had agreed to give me, if the adoption took place. It is a public matter that my daughter had promised to give me Rs. 10,000. I had also told the 1st defendant. I do not know why my daughter was not willing to adopt the 1st defendant. My daughter had promised to give me Rs. 10,000 out of the income of the estate. Dasi Reddi came a third time seven or eight days later. I told my daughter that defendant had agreed to pay me Rs. 10,000 as she had agreed to and that it would be well she should adopt him. When he came the third time I told him I had arranged with my daughter and asked him to take her and complete the document." "The consideration for the suit promissory note was the adoption of the defendant. I agreed to bring about the adoption as the defendant promised to give me Rs. 10,000. If the defendant had not promised to give me Rs. 10,000, there would have been no adoption and I should not have spoken about it to my daughter."

The promissory note was executed for the payment of this sum of Rs. 10,000. The evidence shows that the amount was agreed to be paid as a bribe to Venkatrama Reddi to bring about the adoption. The appellant's Pleader argues that the defendant's evidence shows that the widow herself asked the defendant to execute the bond, as otherwise on account of her father's opposition she might be unable to carry out the adoption. This makes no difference, as there is no suggestion that the payment was made for the widow's benefit. In my opinion this agreement to pay a bribe is one against public policy and cannot be enforced. The appellant's Pleader argues that this case stands on the same footing as an alienation in favour of the widow and is similar to the class of cases dealt with in Ramasami Aiyan v. Venkata Ramaiyan (1) and Visalakshmi Ammal v. Sivaraman (2), and he argues that the decision in Shri Sitaram Pandit v. Shri Harihar Pandit (3), in so far as it is opposed to these decisions. should not be followed. Arrangements made for the benefit of an adopting widow stand on a very different footing. She is not bound in law to make any adoption. In the absence of any adoption she would be entitled to the possession of her husband's property during her life-time and absolutely to the usufruct thereof. Any arrangement, therefore, by which she retains any portions of that interest, which she parts with by an act purely voluntary on her part, might not be against public policy or against Hindu Law. It has also to be remembered that there are various texts of Hindu Law which place a widow's interest even higher than that of a son. See Mayne on Hindu Law, paragraphs 245 and 529. I am, therefore, of opinion that these cases have no bearing.

I am also of opinion for the reasons given by the District Judge that there was no consideration for the assignment. Venkatarama Reddi said in cross-examination that the arrangement was that the plaintiff was to get Rs. 1,000 in case of success in the suit and the balance was to be paid over to him. I am not prepared to accept his subsequent denial of his statement in re-examination. He is, therefore, not entitled to sue.

This appeal is dismissed with costs.

SPENCER. J.—I entirely agree. The case of Devarayan Chetty v. Muthuraman Chetty (4) is in point. In my opinion it was rightly decided in that case that the giving to a third party pecuniary interest in a marriage taking place or, in other words, "trafficking in marriage" is opposed to public policy and is not a legal consideration for a contract. This is in agreement with the English Law relating to marriage brocage contracts. Reading Kalavagunta Venkata Kristnayya v. Kalavagunta Lakshmi Narayana (5) and Murugappa Chetti v. Nagappa Chetti (6), I consider that no distinction can be made between contracts to make payment in consideration of marriage and similar contracts in consideration of adoption. In Murugappa Chetti v. Nagappa Chetti (6) it was held that though the adoption might be valid, the agreement for payment of money was a separate transaction and illegal. This is a transaction of a very different nature from fair and reasonable dispositions in favour of the adopting widow referred to in Visalakshi Ammal v. Sivaraman (2).

Appeal dismissed.

THE MUNICIPAL BOARD OF MUZAFFARNAGAR AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

U.P. Municipalities Act (I of 1900), ss. 2, 91—Powers of Municipal Board to close drain.

Section 2 of the U. P. Municipalities Act cannot be read in such a way as to prevent the Municipal Board from exercising for all time the powers conferred by section 91 of the Act in respect of drains which are a nuisance or injurious to health.

Therefore, even where a person has obtained a decree against his nieghbour declaring his right to pass water along a drain, the Municipal Board is entitled to close the drain if it is injurious to public health.

Second appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut.

FACTS.—The plaintiff's house is adjacent to that of the defendant No. 2 in the city of Muzaffarnagar.

The dirty water of the plaintiff's house had been flowing in a drain passing through the compound of the defendant's house for over fifty years. In a former suit between the parties regarding the flow of this water, plaintiff's right was recognised by Civil Courts in 1886.

Recently the defendant moved the Health Officer and the Municipal Board to change the course of the plaintiff's drain into some other direction. The Municipal Board ordered the plaintiff to close the drain. Hence the suit by plaintiff for declaration and injunction against the defendant and the Municipal Board. The lower Appellate Court held that the Municipal Board had the power to order the closing of the drain and the diverting of the flow of water in some other direction. Hence this second appeal by the plaintiff.

Mr. Nihal Chand, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Abdul Raoof and A. Ryves, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This case appears to me to be on all fours with the case of Abdul Aziz v. Chairman of the Municipal Board of Pilibhit (1), by the decision in which I am bound. According to that case the suit ought to have been dismissed altogether. The Munsif has added a proviso to his decree to which the Municipal Board has taken no objection. The suggestion that the Board was not entitled to close the drain because the plaintiff had obtained a decree declaring his right to pass water along a drain through the defendant's house and that this right is saved by section 2 of the Municipalities Act, cannot be accepted. It is impossible to read section 2 in such a way as to prevent the Municipal Board from exercising for all time the powers conferred by section 91 of the Act in respect of drains which are a nuisance or are injurious to health.

(1) A. W. N. (1905) 79; 2 A. L. J. 222.

The contention raised in the second ground of appeal has no weight. It must be presumed that the Board acted honestly in exercising the powers conferred on it, and it does not signify whether the Board was moved to act by the second defendant or by any one else.

In the fourth ground of appeal it is said that the plaintiff-appellant may be put to considerable expense. That is a matter which does not arise in the present case, nor can I express any opinion on the question whether the Board is bound to give compensation to him or not. In my opinion the decision of the lower Appellate Court is correct. The appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with two separate sets of costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Where an easement is enjoyed peaceably and o penly as of right without interruption for a period of 20 years, the requirements of section 26 of the Limitation Act are fully complied with, and the right becomes absolute.

A kobala admitting the right of the plaintiff to an easement is relevant and as such admissible under section 13 of the Evidence Act.

The plea of misjoinder of causes of action cannot be allowed to be urged for the first time in the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

MULLICK, J.—The plaintiffs in these suits pray for a right of irrigation to their lands from a tank belonging to the defendants. It appears that in Fasli 1315 Sambat the defendants having blocked the alleged channel and the plaintiffs having removed the obstruction, defendant No.1 lodged a complaint before the Magistrate, in consequence of which the plaintiff in Suit No. 580 and the son of the plaintiff in Suit No. 481 were criminally prosecuted for mischief and a fine of Rs. 20 each was imposed on them. In the case before us, the plaintiffs add a prayer for damages to the extent of the above fines and Re. 1 for cutting or opening the channel. The learned Subordinate Judge has found the right of easement established and has also given the plaintiffs the damages claimed.

On appeal several grounds have been taken before us which we will now examine in detail. The first point taken is that the user of the plaintiffs was not within two years of the suit. We find that this point was not taken before the Subordinate Judge and that it is not mentioned in the memorandum of appeal before us. We do not think that we can entertain it at this stage. The next point is that a certain kobala, which has been admitted on behalf of the plaintiff, was improperly admitted. We cannot agree that the evidence was improperly admitted. Section 13 of the Indian Evidence Act is in favour of the plaintiffs on this point; moreover, it does not appear from the judgment of the Court of Appeal below that the point was urged in argument. The third point is that certain persons over whose lands the irrigation channel passes have not been added as parties. In our opinion, these persons need not have been added. The fourth point is that there has been a misjoinder of causes of action. This point was not taken before the learned Subordinate Judge and we do not think we can allow it to be argued before us here. There remains a principal issue in the case, namely, whether an easement has been acquired as of right within the meaning of section 26 of the Limitation Act. It is admitted that there is no case of grant. But the substance of the appellant's attack on the judgment of the Court below is that there is no specific finding that the easement was enjoyed peaceably and openly as of right without interruption for 20 years. Reading the Judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge, which is one of concurrence with that of the Munsif, it is clear to us that what the Court below intends to find is that section 26 of the Limitation Act has been fully complied with. The learned Subordinate Judge states that the plaintiffs have acquired a right of irrigation from time immemorial. The learned Munsif on the beginning of his judgment, sets out the allegations of the plaintiffs, which are that there had been an enjoyment of the easement peaceably and openly as of right without interruption for 20 years. Although on his finding the learned Munsif does not use the words 'as of right', he comes to a general conclusion that the allegations of the plaintiffs have been made out. Reading the judgment as a whole, we are satisfied that he finds that the requirements of the law have been complied with. There remains, finally, the question of damages. It appears that the convictions of the plaintiff in Suit No. 580 and of his son in Suit No. 481 are still in full force. Upon the authorities, it does not seem competent for the plaintiffs to claim damages for malicious prosecution so long as these convictions stand and it is not seriously contended that the damages claimed are other than damages for malicious prosecution. In this view of the case, we think that the decree of the Court below as regards damages must be set aside. The appeals succeed in part. Each party paying his own costs throughout.

WALMSLEY, J.—I agree.

CIVIL REVISION APPLICATION NO. 84 OF 1914.

November 17, 1914.

Present:—Mr. Justice Chamier and Mr. Justice Piggott.

SHEO HARAKH—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

RAMCHANDER—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Bengal, N.-W. P. and Assam Civil Courts Act (XII of 1887), ss. 21 (4), 22—Appeals lying to District Judge ordered to be preferred to Subordinate Judge—Subordinate Judge, power of, to hear such appeals.

Where appeals lying to a District Judge under sub-section 2 of section 21 of the Bengal, N.-W. P. and Assam Civil Courts Act are directed under sub-section (4) to be preferred to the Court of a Subordinate Judge, the intention is that the appeals preferred accordingly should be heard and disposed of by the Subordinate Judge without any order of transfer of such appeals to his Court under section 22 of the Act.

Civil revision against the order of the Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur, dated the 21st November 1913.

FACTS.—The plaintiff took a lease of some land from the respondent, Ram Chander, and paid rent in advance and obtained a receipt for Rs. 124. Another co-sharer of Ram Chander brought a suit for arrears of rent against plaintiff, obtained a decree and realized Rs. 75-6-0 from plaintiff. Plaintiff, therefore, brought a suit to recover that amount on the ground that he had paid it to Ram Chander already, had as he represented himself to be the owner. The first Court decreed the suit, but the Sessions and Subordinate Judge, who heard the appeal, dismissed the suit. Plaintiff applied in revision to the High Court.

Mr. S. D. Sinha, for the Applicant:—The Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal unless it was transferred to him for hearing by the District Judge. Under section 21, Bengal N.-W. P. and Assam Civil Courts Act, appeals from the decrees of Munsifs lie to the District Judge. A notification issued by the Local Government under sub-section (4) merely enables the Subordinate Judge to receive such appeals. The word used in the sub-section is "preferred." The Subordinate Judge, therefore, can have no authority to "hear" the appeals unless there is an order under section 22 of the same Act. So long as the District Judge does not take action under section 22, the appeal is practically pending in his Court and the Subordinate Judge cannot hear it.

Mr. Uma Shanker Bajpai (for Mr. Nawal Kishore), for the Respondent:—The Legislature could never have intended that the power conferred on the Local Government under sub-section (4) should simply enable it to order by the notification that appeals should only be received by the Subordinate Judges and not be heard by them. The inconvenience sought to be avoided by the said notification would still continue, if it were further necessary for the District Judge to issue an order under section 22. When an appeal is preferred in a Court, it is pending in that Court and that Court has the power to hear it. I rely on Sohan Lal v. Baldeo Pershad (1). This ruling would apply to my case as the wording of section 18, sub-sectin (3), Oudh Civil Courts Act, is similar to section 21, sub-section (4), of the Bengal, N.-W. P and Assam Civil Courts Act and the above ruling was made under the former Act.

JUDGMENT.

CHAMIER, J.—This application for revision raises a curious question upon which, so far as we are aware, there has not been any decision of this Court. The plaintiff in this case filed a suit in the Court of the Munsif of Mirzapur, who in July 1913 decreed the claim. The defendant preferred an appeal against the Munsif's decree to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur. The Subordinate Judge proceeded to hear the appeal and in November 1913 allowed the appeal and dismissed the plaintiff's suit. This is an application for revision of the order of the Subordinate Judge, on the ground that the Subordinate Judge, in the absence of an order of the District Judge transferring the appeal to him for disposal, had no jurisdiction to hear it. Under section 21 of the Bengal, N.-W. P. and Assam Civil Courts Act appeals from decrees of Munsifs lie to the District Judge, but under sub-section (4), of that section the High Court may, with the previous sanction of the Local Government, direct by notification in the Official Gazette that appeals lying to the District Judge under sub-section (2) from all or any of the decrees or orders of any Munsif shall be preferred to the Court of such Subordinate Judge as may be mentioned in the notification, and the appeals shall thereupon be preferred accordingly. It appears that on April 25th, 1913, the High Court with the sanction of the Local Government directed by notification in the

(1) 7 O. C. 321.

Official Gazette that appeals from the decrees of the Munsif of Mirzapur should be preferred to the Subordinate Judge of that district. On behalf of the applicant it is contended that that notification merely enabled the Subordinate Judge to receive such appeals, but did not give him any authority to hear them in the absence of an order under section 22 of the same Act. Section 22 is the section which empowers a District Judge to transfer to any Subordinate Judge under his administrative control any appeals pending before him from decrees or orders of the Munsif. According to the argument presented on behalf of the applicant, an appeal which has been preferred under a notification issued under sub-section (4) of section 21 of the Act is pending before the District Judge and, therefore, may be transferred by him to any Subordinate Judge under section 22 of the Act. Speaking for myself I cannot accept this contention. It appears to me that after an appeal has been preferred to the Court of the Subordinate Judge it is pending in that Court, and I find much greater difficulty in holding that section 22 enables the District Judge to transfer such an appeal as an appeal pending before himself than in holding that the Legislature intended that an appeal preferred to a Subordinate Judge under such notification should not be disposed of by him. An exactly similar question arose in Oudh in 1903. In the Oudh Civil Courts Act (XIII of 1879) there is a provision similar to section 21, sub-section (4), of the Bengal, N.-W. P. and Assam Civil Courts Act. Under section 18, sub-section (3), of the Oudh Act, the Judicial Commissioner may, from time to time with the previous sanction of the Local Government, direct by notification in the Official Gazette that appeals from all or any of the decrees or orders of any Munsif shall be preferred to such Subordinate Judge as may be mentioned in the notificatian, and the appeals shall thereupon be preferred accordingly. It will be noticed that there is a slight difference between the language of the Oudh section and the language of section 21 of the Bengal, N.-W. P. and Assam Civil Courts Act, and it has long been the practice in Oudh to insert in the notification under section 18, sub-section (3), the name of the Subordinate Judge to whom the appeals are to be preferred. Whether this was necessary or not may be open to doubt, but the difference between the language of the two sections does not affect the question which we have to decide in this case. In the case of Sohan Lal v. Baldeo Pershad(1) the late Mr. Scott and I held that a Subordinate Judge, to whom appeals are preferred under a notification issued under section 18, sub-section (3), of the Oudh Act, has jurisdiction to dispose of them. I am of the same opinion still. Hundreds if not thousands of appeals have been disposed of by Subordinate Judges in Oudh since the year 1879 upto the year 1903, on the assumption that they had jurisdiction to dispose of them and since 1903, on the strength of the ruling to which I have referred. I have no doubt that the appeal in the present case was rightly disposed of by the Subordinate Judge and I would dismiss this application with costs.

PIGGOTT, J.—I concur both in the order proposed by my learned colleague and generally in the reasoning on which it is based. The only substantial argument in support of this application seems to be that there is nothing in section 21 of the Bengal, N.-W. P. and Assam Civil Courts Act which expressly lays it down that a Subordinate Judge, to whom an appeal has been preferred under sub-section 4 of that section, is to hear and to dispose of the same. To this it seems to me almost sufficient to reply that neither does the Act in question contain any provision that a District Judge, to whom an appeal from a decree or order of a Munsif lies under sub-section (2) of section 21, shall proceed to hear and dispose of the same. I turn to the Code of Civil Procedure to ascertain what a Court has to do to which an appeal has been preferred, and I find under rule 9 of Order XLI that certain endorsements are to be made on the memorandum of appeal and the appeal is to be registered. Then power is conferred on the Appellate Court to dismiss the appeal, if it thinks proper to do so, without sending notice to the Court from whose decree the appeal was preferred and without serving notice on the respondent. After this follow the rules laying down the procedure to be followed when a day is fixed to hear the appeal and notice of the same is issued to the respondent. It is presumed throughout that the Court to which an appeal has been preferred shall do each and all of these things. The question before us in the present case, narrowed down to its ultimate limits, is, what should the Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur have done when this appeal was preferred to him? What he has actually done is to follow the procedure laid down in Order XLI of the Code of Civil Procedure and eventually to dispose of the appeal. The applicant's contention is that he should either have submitted the memorandum of appeal to the District Judge of Allahabad for an order of transfer, or have referred the matter to the said District Judge for the same purpose. There is certainly nothing in Act XII of 1887 which authorises a Subordinate Judge to do anything of this sort, and I concur without hesitation in the opinion expressed by my learned colleague that it would be a severe straining of the language used to say that this appeal, when it has been preferred to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur, was ipso facto pending before the District Judge of Allahabad. It seems to me altogether simpler to hold that the Legislature in drawing up the Civil Courts Act presumed that a Court to which an appeal was lawfully preferred would, in the absence of any order of transfer from a superior Court, proceed to hear and dispose of the same.

BY THE COURT.—The application is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The property in dispute was given to the 1st defendant by her father in 1898 before she was married to the plaintiff. She sold the property to the 3rd defendant in 1912. The plaintiff sues for a declaration that the sale is invalid. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit.

There can be no question that if this property is Saudayika, the 1st defendant was entitled to deal with it at her pleasure. The main argument, therefore, was directed to showing that the term Saudayika does not include gifts prior to marriage. The nature of Stridhanam and its classification with reference to inheritance have given rise to conflicting views, in the Benares School. Courts may be spared a great deal of discussion if the view of the Mitakshara is fully accepted. Vijnaneswara comments on Yajnavalkya's text in Chapter 2, section 11, paragraph 2. He says: "That which was given by the father, by the mother, by the husband, or by a brother; and that which was presented by the maternal uncles and the rest, at the time of wedding, before the nuptial fire; and a gift on a second marriage or gratuity on account of supersession, as will be subsequently explained in the text, 'To a woman whose husband marries a second wife, let him give, &c.,' (and, as indicated) by the word adya (and the text), property obtained by inheritance, purchase, partition, acceptance, finding: all this is Stridhanam according to Manu and the rest." From this we might exclude those enumerated in the concluding portion of the paragraph as the Judicial Committee, though only dealing with a case of property obtained by partition, seem inclined to hold that Stridhanam in its narrow sense should be limited to what is mentioned in the previous portion of the paragraph. Debi Mangal Prasad Singh v. Mahadeo Prasad Singh (1). If we regard this restricted class as Stridhanam at the absolute disposal of a woman, we can steer clear of many difficulties. There is an exception as regards gifts from strangers not given at the nuptial fire or during the marriage procession, and acquisitions made by means of mechanical arts by a married woman. They are subject to the control of the husband, because the spirit of the Hindu Law is against a married woman receiving gifts from strangers except at the time of marriage or from making acquisitions during coverture, as she is expected to give her time and attention solely to the welfare of her husband and children and to the management of household affairs. I see nothing in the Mitakshara or in the writings of those whose authority is binding in Southern India against accepting this rule as a workable basis. But Courts have taken into account the sub-divisions of Stridhanam both in relation to inheritance and the power of disposition; I shall, therefore, proceed on the same lines and consider whether the property in dispute is subject to any control by the husband.

An examination of the various commentaries shows that Stridhanam is divisible into Yautaka and Ayautaka. Yautaka is that which is given at the nuptial fire. That interpretation is in accordance with the etymological significance of the term. In that term, moreover, are included all gifts made during the marriage ceremonies. Ayautaka is gift made before or after marriage. Saudayika includes both Yautaka and Ayautaka not received from strangers. It is defined to be gifts from affectionate kindred. This property can be dealt with by a married woman in any way she likes. Whether immoveable property received from the husband should be excluded from this species of disposable property is doubtful. The better view is against such restriction.

Among the Rishis only Katyayana, Vyasa and Vishnu use the expression Saudayika. The definition by Rishi Katyayana is the basis of discussion by the commentators of the various Schools of Hindu Law. According to him, the term certainly includes all gifts by the relations of the bride at, before, or after the marriage. Mr. Ghose's translation of the text is, "By a married woman or by a maiden whatever is received from the husband's father's family, from the brothers, or from the parents is called Saudayika." Mr. Srivinasa Aiyangar contended that as the author of the Smriti Chandrika restricts it to gifts made between the time of betrothal of a bride and the time of her entering the house of her husband, the property in dispute is not Saudayika. The author of the Smrithi Chandrika after discussing the text of the Rishis states his conclusion in Chapter IX, section 2, placitum 7, thus: "Both the foregoing passages tend to show that Saudayika is the wealth called 'Yautaka,' or the like received by a woman from her own parents or persons connected with them, in the house of either her father or her husband, from the time of her betrothal to the completion of the ceremony to be performed on the occasion of her entering her lord's house." I agree with the learned Vakil that it is not the literal meaning of an original text alone that has to be looked at in the administration of Hindu Law. As pointed out by the Judicial Committee in Collector of Madura v. Moottoo Ramalinga Sathupathy(2), although the commentators may have been wrong in their interpretation of an original text, their opinion should be enforced as having the sanction of usage for it. I do not think there is any force in Mr. Ghose's criticism of this dictum. Those who are conversant with the commentary of Vijnaneswara will readily recognise the force of the observation of the Judicial Committee. Yajnavalkaya's view is often not traceable in the elaborate discussion carried on by Vijnaneswara and in the conclusions at which he arrives. The fact is that commentators felt that any attempt to prescribe rules of inheritance on their own initiative will not find acceptance among the people. They had to justify their position by a reference to the sayings of the Rishis. This led them not unfrequently to depart from the literal meaning of the texts commented upon. They found a body of usage which was not in strict accordance with the Smritis. They had to recognise the force of such usage; but they preferred to say that the usage was within the meaning of the text. The commentaries indicate an attempt to reconcile the text law with the actual usage of the people. The development of Hindu Law is attributable to this progressive instinct. I am, therefore, willing to accept that the interpretation of Katyayana's text by the author of Smrithi Chandrika may be regarded as showing that in his days there was a tendency to restrict the use of the term Saudayika. Apparently, there was an attempt at this period to put fetters upon the power of disposition possessed by women over their Stridhanam. It has to be noted that the passage I have quoted from the Smriti Chandrika does not express the positive opinion of the author. The conclusion is stated hesitatingly. Moreover, later writers have expounded Katyayana differently. The Smriti Chandrika was written in the thirteenth century. The Madhavya in the fourteenth century and the Saraswati Vilasa in the sixteenth century, both of which are recognised authorities in Southern India, do not accept the views of the author of the Smriti Chandrika. This shows that the set-back in favour of giving the husband larger powers of interference over his wife's property was only temporary. The text itself is clear and its interpretation in works both contemporaneous with and after the Smriti Chandrika has been uniform. [See Madana Parijata (13th century), page 530, Part 2, Setlur's Hindu Law Books on Inheritance; Vivada Ratnakara (14th century) Chapter VIII, page 189, ibid; Vivada Chintamani (15th century), page 255, ibid; Dayatattva (16th century) Chapter XI, para. 3, page 499, ibid; Viramitrodaya (17th century), Chapter V, Part I, para. 5, page 442, ibid.] I am therefore, of opinion that the view of the author of Smriti Chandrika is not binding on us.

It has been argued that as Vijnaneswara gives no indication of his opinion regarding the right of disposition possessed by women over Saudayika, he must be taken to be against their having absolute dominion over it. On the contrary, the fact that he accepts Katyayana without any comment shows that he found no reason for differing from the sage. The Futwas of Pundits have been consistently in favour of giving woman absolute power of disposal over Saudayika of the kind mentioned in Katyayana's text. (Vyvasta Darpana, pages 687 to 692; Vyvasta Chandrika, Book V, Chapter II, section 2.) All the modern text-writers are in favour of that view. Dr. Gurudass Banerjee in his learned treatise on Marriage and Stridhanam subjects the texts and commentaries to a very critical examination and comes to the conclusion that 'Saudayika is at the absolute disposal of the donee.

There are not many cases dealing with this question. Most of the decided cases relate to succession. There is, however, a direct pronouncement on the point in Selwyn's S. A. D. Reports, Vol. VI, page 77. In Judoo Nath Sirkar v. Bussunt Coomar Roy Chowdhry (3) to which our attention was drawn by Mr. T. Rangachariar, it was held by Mr. Justice Mitter that legacy taken under the Will of her father by a woman before her marriage was Saudayika. There is no reason why this principle should not be extended to gifts inter vivos. In Bhau v. Raghunath (4) the property in dispute was a vritti inherited from the husband; and it was held that it was not Saudayika. Sir Lawrence Jenkins quotes the text of Katyayana and says that Saudayika as defined by the sage is at the absolute disposal of a woman. In Dantuluri Rayapparaz v. Malapudi Rayudu (5) the actual decision related to the power of a relation to compel a woman to carry out a promise to make a gift of her property. The learned Judges held "that the taking of the woman's property by the plaintiff, her kinsmen, is wholly repugnantat to the Hindu Law." They also expressed a doubt whether a woman had independent power of disposal during coverture over her Stridhanam. The texts bearing upon the subject were not examined and the pronouncement proceeds upon the general theory of the dependence of women in India. With all respect, the learned Judges have not realised that the power of disposition over property given to women under the Hindu Law is greatly in advance of the views held regarding it by other civilised communities. The Hindu Law deals with the dependence of women more as a right inhering in them for protection and as a duty resting upon men than as a disqualification for dealing with property.

(3) 19 W. R. 264.
(4) 30 B. 229; 7 Bom. L. R. 936
(5) 2 M. H. C. R. 360.

Mr. Bhashyam Iyengar contended that the terms of the deed of gift showed that the property was given only conditionally and consequently it was not Saudayika. He referred to a passage in Viramitrodaya to the effect that conditional and collusive gifts are not Stridhanam. No other commentator has been quoted in support of this contention. I feel no doubt that the conditional gift therein referred to is one where a right of reversion is reserved to the donor. It may also include cases of nominal transfer made on the understanding that it should go back to the donor after the contemplated fraud had been accomplished. Nor is there any force in the contention that a gift exceeding 2,000 fanams in value is not to be regarded as Stridhanam. As pointed by Mr. T. Rangachariar, this may relate to property yielding an annual income of 2,000 fanams. It was only intended as a direction to the donor. It may have been due to the belief that women may not be able to manage extensive properties. These considerations can have no weight in these days. The text must be regarded as obsolete.

The appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs.

WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—I agree that the appeal must be dismissed with costs, and will only observe that considerable gifts by a father to his daughter prior to betrothal would seem not to have been of frequent occurrence in early times, as we do not find them separately dealt with in any of the texts or commentaries that have been cited before us. In this state of things, I do not think that the statement in the Smriti Chandrika is of the same authority as an express statement that gifts made by a father to his daughter before betrothal are not Saudayika. The author may not have had such gifts in mind when he wrote this passage and even if he had, his opinion is expressed only tentatively and cannot, in my opinion, outweigh the authority of the other texts which have been cited. Lastly, if we may look to the reason of the thing, there is no reason why such gifts should be less at the disposal of the wife than gifts made at the time of marriage.

Adverse possession by one co-owner against another—Presumption—Acts of hostile character—Exclusive possession.

To establish as amongst co-owners of joint property that there has been adverse possession of one against the others by reason of a particular act to which a hostile character is attributed, it must be conclusively shown that such act is wholly inconsistent with, and is not by any possibility attributable to, his character as joint owner.

A case of adverse possession by a co-owner cannot be established by mere paper assertions not brought home to the knowledge of the other co-owners, when there has been no actual exclusion of the latter from use and enjoyment for the period of limitation.

The entry and possession of land under the common title of one co-owner will not be presumed to be adverse to the others, but will ordinarily be held to be for the benefit of all.

Appeal against decree of the Sub-Judge, Jessore, dated 22nd July 1911, reversing that of the Munsif, first Court, at Bongaon, dated 3rd June 1910.

Moulvi Wahid Hossain, for the Appellants.

Babus Baidya Nath Dutt and Mohini Nath Bose, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs for recovery of joint possession of 13/54ths share of the disputed land on declaration of title thereto. The property belonged originally to three brothers, Nasir Mondal, Kader Mondal and Jiabuddy Mondal. Nasir left two daughters, Kader two sons and Jiabuddy a son and a daughter. The plaintiffs are the daughter of Jiabuddy and the three sons of the second daughter of Nasir. The defendants are the representatives of the other members of the family as also transferees from them. The Court of first instance found that the title alleged by the plaintiffs had been established and gave them a decree for joint possession. Upon appeal the Subordinate Judge has held that the title of the plaintiffs must be deemed to have been extinguished by adverse possession for more than 12 years on the part of their co-sharers. The decision of the Court of first instance upon the question of the title of the plaintiffs by inheritance does not appear to have been challenged before the Subordinate Judge, and the only question for decision at this stage is, whether such title by inheritance has been extinguished by adverse possession on the part of their co-proprietors.

In proof of the adverse possession alleged by the defendants, reliance is placed mainly upon two transactions, namely, a litigation of 1878 and a conveyance of 1886. It appears that the landlord had brought the property to sale, purchased it himself and settled it with one Moonshi Mondal. In 1878 the son of Jiabuddy, one of the sons of Kader and one of the daughters of Nasir jointly instituted a suit to recover the property from Moonhsi Mondal on the allegation that the sale was invalid and that the landlord had no authority to settle the land with him. It has been contended that the institution of this suit by three of the six representatives of the original owners shows exclusively that they claimed at the time under a title hostile to that of their co-sharers. We are of opinion that this contention is not well-founded. To establish as amongst the co-owners of joint property that there has been adverse possession of one against the others by reason of a particular act to which a hostile character is attributed, it must be conclusively shown that such act is wholly inconsistent with, and is not by any possibility attributable to, his character as joint owner. The act upon which reliance is placed before us is undoubtedly not of this description. It is no more consistent with the theory that the then plaintiffs were claiming adversely to their co-owners than with the theory that each of the plaintiffs represented his branch of the family. The Court of first instance thus rightly held that the institution of the suit of 1878 by these three persons did not necessarily constitute a hostile act on their part as against their co-owners.

The other transaction upon which reliance is placed is the conveyance executed on the 29th November 1886 by one of the two daughters of Nasir and one of the two sons of Kader in favour of the son of Jiabuddy. In this document the transferors professed to be owners each of one-third of the disputed land. This, no doubt, was an assertion of a hostile title as against the co-sharers of each of the transferors. But this does not indicate that the transferee also claimed an exclusive title to a third share of the land as against his sister, the first plaintiff in this suit. The Subordinate Judge has overlooked this fundamental distinction, and has failed to differentiate the case of the first plaintiff from that of the other three plaintiffs. This conveyance, though possibly indicative of an assertion of hostile title by one of the daughters of Nasir against her sister or the children of her sister if the latter were at the time in existence, does not show an adverse claim by the son of Jiabuddy against his sister. In so far therefore as the second, third and fourth plaintiffs are concerned, the Court has to investigate whether the transaction and its true character were brought to their notice, for, as was laid down by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Anandrao Ganpatrao v. Vasantrao Madhavrao (1), a case of adverse possession by a co-owner cannot be established by mere paper assertions not brought home to the knowledge of the other co-owners, when there has been no actual exclusion of the latter from use and enjoyment for the period of limitation. This raises at once the question of the true character of this document. It has not been disputed that the ostensible transferee was not the real transferee; consequently the Court must determine whether the transaction was wholly fictitious, and whether even if intended to be genuine, the co-owners could discover the real transferee in whose favour the assertion of hostile title was made. This aspect of the matter has not been considered by the Subordinate Judge, and his judgment must be deemed essentially imperfect.

Apart from these two transactions, there remains the important question of the true nature of the possession of Ajgar Mondal after the conveyance of 1886. The Subordinate Judge has not found explicity whether he was in exclusive occupation, in assertion of a hostile title to the knowledge of his co-owners. As was pointed out by this Court in the case of Jogendra Nath Roy v Baladeb Das (2), the fundamental rule is that the entry and possession of land under the common title of one co-owner will not be presumed to be adverse to the others but will ordinarily be held to be for the benefit of all. The obvious reason for this rule is that the possession of one co-owner is in itself rightful, and does not imply hostility as would the possession of a mere stranger, in other words, the law considers every possession lawful the commencement and continuance of which is not proved to be wrongful, and this upon the plain principle that every man shall be presumed to act in obedience to his duty until the contrary is established. In the case before us the Court of first instance found that the co-owners of Ajgar, who were his relations, namely, his sister and nephews, visited him occasionally and received presents of fruits and other produce of the land. The Subordinate Judge has not dealt with this part of the case properly. He has not negatived the finding that these co-owners did come to the house of Ajgar at times, but he has refused to believe that Ajgar gave the plaintiffs their share of the produce. It may be pointed out that the Subordinate Judge here misunderstood the case of the plaintiffs. They did not assert that they regularly received from Ajgar a definite share of the produce as representing the extent of their interest in the land. Their case was that they were on friendly terms with Ajgar, visited him from time to time, and received from him part of the produce of the land by way of present. This story, if found true, would negative the theory that the possession of Ajgar was hostile to that of his co-sharers or that he had asserted a hostile title as against them to their knowledge. The Court of first instance correctly laid down the law when it stated that the defendants had to show that Ajgar had asserted his exclusive right openly and to the knowledge of the plaintiffs or that the plaintiffs were denied their title at any time before 12 years. The Subordinate Judge has not found that the plaintiffs asserted a title to this property and that Ajgar denied that they had such title. He has not found that they asked for a share of the produce and that their claim was refused. We are of opinion that the judgment of the Subordinate Judge is substantially defective and that his decree cannot be maintained.

The result is that the appeal is allowed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside and the case remanded to him in order that he may re-hear the appeal.

Costs will abide the result.

JUDGMENT.—The compromise is in our opinion admissible in evidence under the decision of the Privy Council in Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (1). In that case their Lordships decided that petitions by the creditor accepted as correct by the debtor and presented to the Courts would have been admissible without registration in proof of a variation of a registered contract. These documents were described by their Lordships as pleadings filed by the parties and the compromise petition in the present case occupies a corresponding position. In Natesan Chetty v. Vengu Nachiar (2) to which one of us was a party and with which we both agree, this view was taken of the decision in Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (1) and we do not find that it has been expressly dissented from in Ravula Parti Chelamana v. Ravula Parti Rama Row (3), though in that case the learned Judges seem to put a different interpretation on the language of the Privy Council. Taking this view, it follows that if the compromise, properly construed, evidences an actually effected release by the 3rd defendant of his rights in the family property, it is admissible in evidence and if, as is argued, it evidences only an agreement to give a release, then also it does not require registration.

We reverse the decree of the District Judge and remand the case to him; he will receive the document, Exhibit A3, in evidence and dispose of the appeal according to law. Costs will abide the event.

Registration Act (III of 1877), s. 17—Compromise petition filed in mutation case—Stamp—Registration.

A petition presented to a Revenue Court in a mutation case and stating that the parties had compromised their dispute and praying that mutation may be sanctioned in accordance with the compromise, does not require to be stamped or registered as a transfer of interest in immoveable property.

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge of Gorakhpur.

Mr. Haribans Sahai, for the Appellant.

Mr. Jang Bahadur Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The suit out of which this appeal has arisen relates to an estate which was recorded in the name of one Chandrika Dube and after his death in the name of his widow, Musammat Anurani. Upon the death of Musammat Anurani in the year 1900, the patwari submitted a death report stating that her daughter, Musammat Jagrani, the present plaintiff, was her heir and that her name ought to be entered in the revenue papers. An objection was preferred by Mulai, the son of one of the brothers of Chandrika Dube. The dispute was compromised by Jagrani and Mulai (who was the father of the defendants-respondents) on the 12th of February 1901. By this compromise Jagrani withdrew her claim and consented to the entry of the name of Mulai in the place of Anurani. It may be mentioned that Mulai's contention in the Revenue Court was that the family was joint and that he alone was entitled to the property in question. The Revenue Court passed an order directing the name of Mulai to be entered in accordance with the compromise. The plaintiff brought the present suit for recovery of possession of the property of which Mulai was, and after him the defendants have been in possession since the year 1901. She denied having entered into the compromise, asserted that she knew nothing as to the terms of it and that a fraud had been practised on her, and alleged that her father was separate and she was entitled to his property upon the death of her mother. The defendants on the other hand relied on the compromise, repeated their assertion as to the family having been joint and stated that the plaintiff was unchaste and was not entitled to inherit her father's property. The Court of first instance found that the family was separate, but it was of opinion that the compromise was made by the plaintiff with full knowledge of it, that it was binding on her, that there was consideration for it and that the defendants had discharged debts due by Chandrika Dube and Anurani. That Court dismissed the suit

ALWAR CHETTY v. CHIDAMBARA MUDALI.

The decree of the Court of first instance was affirmed in appeal by the learned Judge. He was of opinion that the compromise was admissible in evidence; he was further of opinion that the compromise was binding on the plaintiff.

Upon the first point, I think the decision of the learned Judge is right. The petition presented in the mutation case only informed the Court of the compromise which the parties had effected. That petition did not require to be stamped or registered as a transfer of interest in immoveable property. The case is similar in some respects to that of Kokla v. Pearey Lal (1).

On the second point, viz., whether the plaintiff was fully cognisant of the terms of the compromise and of its effect upon her interests, the finding of the learned Judge is not very satisfactory. What the learned Judge says is this: "The Revenue Court, however, was satisfied that she agreed. Her father-in-law and his brother undoubtedly sanctioned her action and she signed the paper." Whether the learned Judge in making the above remarks only meant to refer to what had taken place in the Revenue Court or to find that with the advice of her father-in-law and his brother the plaintiff had entered into the compromise with full knowledge of what she was doing and what its effect would be upon her interests, is not very clear. The learned Judge does not in distinct terms find against the plaintiff on this point on the strength of the evidence adduced in the case. It will, therfore, be more satisfactory to have a clear finding from him on this point. Furthermore, if Chandrika Dube was separate the plaintiff would ordinarily be his heir after the death of her mother. If she agreed to give up her interest there must have been some consideration for the relinquishment of her rights. The Court of first instance found that there was consideration for such relinquishment. This finding of the Court of first instance was disputed in appeal in the Court below, but the learned Judge came to no finding in regard to it and he deemed it unnecessary to discuss the point. In my opinion for a satisfactory decision of this case, it is necessary to have findings from the Court below on the following issues. which I refer to that Court under Order XLI, rule 25, of the Code of Civil Procedure :—

(1) Did the plaintiff enter into the compromise of the 12th of February 1901 with full knowledge of its contents and of its effect upon her interests after obtaining proper advice in regard thereto?

(2) Was there any, and if so what, consideration for the said compromise?

(3) Was the property in suit the separate property of Chandrika Dube or was it the property of a joint family of which he and Mulai were members?

(4). Did the plaintiff become unchaste before the death of her mother?

The Court will try the above issues on the evidence already upon the record. On receipt of its findings the usual ten days will he allowed for filing objections.

On receipt of the findings his Lordship delivered the following

JUDGMENT.—Upon the first issue referred to the Court below its finding is that Musammat Jagrani, the plaintiff, entered into the compromise with full knowledge of its contents and of its effect upon her interests after obtaining proper advice in regard thereto. On the second issue it finds that there was consideration for the compromise, though it was not as adequate as it should have been. Upon these findings, which are findings of fact, the plaintiff's appeal must fail. I accordingly dismiss it with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

of deceased minor on that date—Sale of one item of property by son on attaining majority—Subsequent sale by Administrator-General of same item of property, validity of.

If an Administrator-General takes out Letters of Administration to the estate, moveable or immoveable, of a Hindu dying intestate, the whole estate of the deceased vests in the Administrator-General and he can dispose of it without the sanction of the Court, in such manner as may appear to him proper.

An administration cannot be treated as closed until every act necessary for its completion has been done.

Where, therefore, the Administrator-General in order to realize the commission due to him sold an item of immoveable property forming part of the estate of the deceased while that same item had been previously sold by the son of the deceased on attaining majority:

Held, that the sale by the latter was a nullity, as that property still vested in the Administrator-General, and not in the son.

JUDGMENT.

SPENCER, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the learned Chief Justice sitting as a single Judge on the original side of the High Court.

Upon the death of one Rajamanicka Mudali, the father of the 1st defendant, the Administrator-General was directed by an order of Mr. Justice Boddam upon a petition presented to him on the original side to take out Letters of Administration to the estate of the deceased. Accordingly, Letters of Administration, which are Exhibit Y, were granted to the Administrator-General on the 28th March 1899. The 1st defendant is said to have attained his majority on November 19th, 1904. On the same day he mortgaged a house belonging to the estate of his deceased father in favour of the 3rd defendant; and on the 26th April 1905 he sold the same house to the plaintiff for Rs. 2,500. Subsequently in July 1905 the Administrator-General at the 1st defendant's request sold this house to the 2nd defendant for Rs. 2,300 in order to recover the commission due to him for the administration of the estate, and a sale-deed was executed on the 1st August 1905 to that defendant. The plaintiff brought this suit for a declaration that the sale by the Administrator-General to the 2nd defendant was invalid; but this contention was found against him and the suit was dismissed. He now appeals.

The appellant's Pleader in his arguments has raised the following questions:—(1) Was the sale by the Administrator-General, after the 1st defendant attained majority and without the orders of the Court, a good and valid sale? (2) Did the property vest in the Administrator-General by virtue of the Letters of Administration? and (3) Did the property vest in any other members of the family?

The last point may be briefly disposed of by pointing out that if the property passed by survivorship to any person other than 1st defendant, the plaintiff who claims to derive title from 1st defendant will be out of Court.

The answer to the first question must depend on the answer to be given to another question which is, what powers does the Administrator-General possess when dealing with the estates of Hindus administered by him under Act II of 1874?

Section 17 of this Act empowers a Court to pass such an order as Exhibit K purports to be, directing the Administrator-General to apply for Letters of Administration of the effects of any persons, including Hindus, who die leaving assets within the local limits of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction of the High Court in the Presidency Towns. Section 18 provides that, in cases where danger is apprehended of such property being wasted before the legal successor can be ascertained, the Court may authorise the Administrator-General to collect and take possession of such property and hold it according to the orders and directions of the Court, and thereupon the Administrator-General shall be entitled to collect and take possession of such property and if necessary, to maintain a suit for the recovery thereof. This section is not a section under which Letters of Administration are granted, because it expressly refers to the contingency of Letters being afterwards granted. The section under which Letters of Administration are granted is section 20, and this section contains no words to the effect that the Administrator-

General must act "under the orders and directions of the Court." In the absence of any words to the contrary, it may be presumed that after receiving the Letters of Administration he should exercise his ordinary powers as Administrator-General. In the case of In the goods of Hari Das Dutt (1) it was held by Harington, J, that an Administrator-General holding an estate under section 18 of the Administrator-General's Act pending the grant of Letters of Administration would not be in any better position than a private Administrator. In Lalchand Ramdayal v. Gumtibai, Ghella Pema v. Gumtibai (2) there is an observation at page 153 that an Administrator-General who has obtained a fiat for Letters of Administration would have no higher authority over, or estate in, the deceased's property than any ordinary Administrator would have over, or in, the property of a deceased Hindu, whatever that authority or estate might be. The Act itself does not define the powers of the Administrator-General. But under the Charter of 1866 this High Court was invested with power to grant Letters of Administration in such manner and form as was at that time in use, or might hereafter be in use, in the Diocese of London and to do all other things whatsoever needful and necessary on that behalf. (See Morley's Digest, Vol. II, page 619.)

This leads us to the second question, whether the estate vested in the Administrator-General by virtue of the grant of the Letters of Administration. The learned Chief Justice has held that it did, notwithstanding the fact that no vesting section is to be found in the Administrator-General's Act. Section 179 of the Indian Succession Act and section 4 of the Probate and Administration Act expressly provide that the executor or administrator of a deceased person is his legal representative for all purposes and all the property of the deceased person vests in him as such. Before these sections can be applied, it must be considered whether the Administrator-General's Act is a self-contained Act, or whether it must be read subject to the provisions of either of these two Acts, so far as they can be applied to the circumstances of the particular case. By section 2 of the Hindu Wills Act (XXI of 1870), section 179 of the Indian Succession Act was applied to the Wills of Hindus in the towns of Bombay and Madras and was again repealed by section 154 of the Probate and Administration Act. The result of this is that, so far as the Wills of Hindus are concerned, section 179 which vests the estate of a deceased Hindu in his Administrator does not apply, although certain other sections of the Indian Succession Act do apply to Wills of Hindus; but the present case, being a case of intestacy, will not be governed by the Hindu Wills Act (XXI of 1870). Again, if the Administrator-General's Act has to be read subject to the provisions of the Probate and Administration Act, section 4 which vests the property in the Administrator will apply; and also section 90, which restricts the power of an Administrator to dispose of property by way of sale or mortgage without the previous permission of the Court, must be applied. In the Succession Act there is no restriction such as is contained in section 90 of the Probate and Administration Act, and, therefore, if the cases of Hindus dying intestate ought to be governed by the Succession Act, there can be no doubt that the estate of the deceased is vested in the Administrator and that he has full powers to dispose of it in such manner as may appear to him proper. With reference to the Charter which gives powers similar to those in use in the Diocese of London, it may be observed that the office of the Administrator-General in this country corresponds to that of the Public Trustee in England, and the powers of a Public Trustee, when dealing with small estates of a capital value not exceeding £1,000, include such powers as arise from the fact that after he declares in writing signed and sealed by him that he takes over the administration of the estate, the estate excepting copyhold and stock vests in him as if it were transferred to him by a vesting order under the Trustee Act. The learned Chief Justice has observed in this connection that according to the practice of the English Court of Probate, the Administrator would have power to deal with everything that is covered by the grant without obtaining the special sanction of the Court. Although the Administrator-General's Act does not, in express words, state that all the properties over which the Administrator-General has obtained Letters of Administration vest in him, section 33 contemplates the fact that estates may be vested in the Administrator-General by virtue of Letters of Administration. In the absence of any words of limitation in this Act, we feel no doubt that the learned Chief Justice was right in holding that the estate of Rajamanicka Mudali vested in the Administrator-General. It has further been argued that in any case the Administrator-General had no authority to dispose of immoveables. Although in Kadumbinee Dossee v. Koylash Kaminee Dossee (3) it was considered that Letters of Administration applied only to moveables, section 23 (a) has been introduced subsequently by Act IX of 1881 and makes it clear that there is no distinction to be made in India between real property and personalty, by declaring that Letters of Administration shall have effect over all the property and estate, moveable or immoveable, of the deceased throughout the Presidency.

(1) 11 C W. N. 193.
(2) 8 B. H, C. R. 140 (O. C.).

A further difficulty has arisen in this case owing to the provisions of section 90 of the Probate and Administration Act having been embodied in the Letters of Administration (Exhibit Y) granted to the Administrator-General and printed on the reverse of the same. It appears from inquiries that we have caused to be made that it is the practice on the original side to print section 90 of the Probate and Administration Act on the last page of all Letters of Administration whenever they are granted under that Act.

Whether this section, which restricts the power of the Administrator to mortage, or transfer by sale, the property of which he takes control, was added to the grant in this particular case by design or accident cannot now be ascertained. But in either case section 149 of the Probate and Administration Act destroys the effect of this addition. This section declares that "nothing contained in this Act shall affect the rights, duties and privileges of the Administrator-General, Bengal, Madras or Bombay." Section 52 of the Administrator-General's Act permits Administrators-General of Bombay and Madras to retain a commission of 5 per cent. upon the amount or value of the assets which they collect and distribute in the due course of administration.

The administration cannot be treated as closed until every act necessary for its completion has been done; and such was not the case here as may be seen from Exhibit T, dated 18th August 1905.

It, therefore, appears that the Administrator-General had not, in the present case, been divested of his powers at the time when the sale to the 2nd defendant was made, and, therefore, that he was acting within the scope of his authority in conducting the sale. In this view of the case, the plaintiff's appeal fails and must be dismissed. The 2nd and 4th respondents: costs (one set) will be borne by the estate. Appellant will bear his own costs. The 3rd defendant, who took a mortgage of the suit house from the 1st defendant, supports the plaintiff in this appeal and pleads that even if the legal estate was not divested by the first sale, yet the beneficial interest has already passed to him to the knowledge of the Administrator-General and that he is entitled to retain it in spite of the second sale.

In regard to this contention we are of opinion that 3rd defendant's case must stand or fall with the decision of the question of the property being vested in the Administrator-General at the time when 1st defendant entered into transaction with plaintiff and 3rd defendant.

The 3rd defendant will bear his own costs of this appeal.

SANKARAN NAIR, J.—I agree.

the Land Aquisition Officer to make a fair, reasonable and proper award based upon a proper inquiry after the proper means have been placed before him for holding such inquiry.

The bare fact that previous negotiations for sale had taken place between the claimant and the Government, is not a sufficient reason for not putting forward a claim under section 9 of the Act.

Section 25 (2) of the Act gives the Judge the right to decide as to the sufficiency or otherwise of the reasons for a man's non-appearance and not putting forward his claim under section 9 of the Act, and where no sufficient reason is given the Judge ought not to interfere with the award of the Collector.

First appeal from a decree of the District Judge of Saharanpur.

Mr. A. H. C. Hamilton (with him Dr. Sunder Lal), for the Appellant.

Mr. A. E. Ryves, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of proceedings taken under the Land Acquisition Act. Notice was issued in pursuance of section 9 of the Act to the present appellant and he made no claim as directed under that section. The Collector made an award and the appellant applied for reference to the District Court. In the District Court an objection was taken that as he had made no claim under section 9, the Court was not empowered to award any compensation greater in amount than that mentioned in the Collector's award. The learned District Judge held that because there had been previous negotiations between the Government on the one part and the appellant on the other in which the Government had offered to purchase the land for Rs. 50,000, whereas the appellant had offered to sell for, or rather had refused to sell for, anything less than Rs. 80,000, therefore there was sufficient reason for the appellant not having put forward his claim under section 9 of the Act. He, therefore, proceeded to hear the reference. On behalf of the Government no objection has been taken to the amount awarded by the District Judge, but it is sought to support their case and to defeat the appeal by urging that no reason, much less a substantial reason, has been shown for the appellant having failed to make a claim under section 9 of the Act. In our opinion the appellant showed no reason, much less a sufficient reason, for not making the claim. The Judge says in his award that the appellant might well have thought that he had made it sufficiently clear to Government what he wanted. It is perfectly true that the appellant offered to sell his property to Government for Rs. 80,000 which is the value he places upon it. When, however, action was taken and notice issued to him under the Act, those negotiations had fallen through and come to an end. If the appellant had made his claim he would have asked for Rs. 80,000, the value he places on the property, plus 15 per cent. for compulsory acquisition. So it is quite clear that there was no reason whatsoever for his not having made his claim under the Act. The object of making an owner claim under section 9 of the Act is set out in the case of Secretary of State for India in Council v. Bishun Dutt (1). It is to enable the Land Acquisition Officer to make a fair, reasonable and proper award based upon a proper inquiry after the proper means have been placed before him for holding such inquiry. No inquiry as to the value of the land is stated to have been made beforehand and if the appellant wished to retain his right of reference to the District Court, he ought in justice to the Government to have come forward and placed before the Collector, in pursuance of the notice issued, all available means to enable that Officer to arrive at a correct and proper award. The bare fact that previous negotiations for sale had taken place was no reason whatsoever for not putting forward his claim under section 9 of the Act. It certainly was not sufficient reason. In our opinion section 25, clause 2, gives the Judge the right to decide as to the sufficiency or otherwise of the reasons for a man's non-appearance and not putting forward his claim under section 9. In the present case no reason, in our opinion, was given for this non-appearance.

In this view the District Judge ought not really to have allowed in his award to the appellant any sum greater than that awarded by the Collector. But as the Government has taken no objection to the amount awarded by the District Judge either in the form of a cross-appeal or cross-objections, it is not for us to interfere with the amount so awarded. The result is that the appeal must fail and is dismissed with costs.

Landlord and tenant—Nanjai holding—Ryot's right to use a portion of holding as seed-bed—Damages for non-cultivation—Zemindar must prove wrong use—Burden of proof.

Prima facie the utilization of a reasonable portion of a nanjai holding for nathankal, i. e., for growing seedlings for subsequent transplantation, is a proper use of the land and to make out a claim for damages for non-cultivation of the nathankal plots, the zemindar must show that the plots were wrongly used as such or that the ryot might and ought to have grown a crop to maturity on the same plots after removing the seedlings.

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, against the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Madura (East), in Small Cause Suit No. 494 of 1904.

Mr. K. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Petitioner.

The Hon'ble Sir V. C. Desikachariar, for Mr. T. Rangachariar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This case is similar to Civil Revision Petition No. 253 of 1905 with the addition that there is here a question whether the utilization of a portion of the land for nathankal, i. e., for growing seedlings for subsequent transplantation, is or is not a proper cultivation of the land in due season. The Subordinate Judge says the landlord is not bound to provide plots for seedlings. That may be so, but that is not the question. The question is rather whether the tenant is entitled to grow seedlings for his own transplanting and if he does so whether he can be made to pay varam for the nathankal plot of land, if he is unable after transplanting the seedlings to grow on the same plot a crop to maturity.

I have not been shown any case in which the point has been decided or any evidence in the suits under consideration bearing on this question; the allegation that remission is not granted for nathankal is beside the point.

Prima facie the utilization as seed-bed of a reasonable portion of a nanjai holding is a proper use of the land and prima facie the ryot will get all he can out of his holding; it lies, therefore, on the zemindar to show that the nathankal plots were wrongly used as such or that the ryot might and ought to have grown a crop to maturity on the same plots after removing the seedlings.

In the absence of such evidence I must hold that the zemindar has not made out a claim for damages for non-cultivation of the nathankal plots.

The decree must be modified by reducing the amount awarded to the plaintiff accordingly.

Costs will be paid and received in proportion to success and failure in both Courts.

Decree modified.

An adoption by a widow of her co-wife's son does not have the effect of making him her heir to the prejudice of her father's agnatic heirs.

Where a sonless proprietor made a gift of his landed property in equal shares to his daughter, her son and the son of his other pre-deceased daughter and on the death of the 1st daughter's son his share passed to the daughter, on a suit by the collaterals on her death for recovery of lands gifted to her and her son:

Held, that the donor did not create a joint tenancy with remainder to the survivor and that, therefore, the suit was not barred by reason of one of the donees being alive.

Second appeal from the decree of the Divisional Judge, Sialkot, dated the 11th May 1912, reversing that of the District Judge, Sialkot, dated the 23rd December 1910, decreeing the plaintiff's claim.

Messrs. Devi Dayal and Ahmad Hassan, for the Appellant.

Mr. G. C. Narang, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The full pedigree-table is given in the judgment of the learned Divisional Judge, but the following sufficiently explains the relationship of the parties for the purpose of this appeal :—

Karm Dad, the husband of Musammat Jiwan, had a second wife, Musammat Karm Bibi, by whom he had a son, Chiragh Din. The latter died in 1895, leaving a widow, Musammat Mehr Bibi (defendant No. 1), and a daughter married to Bhulla (defendant No. 2). About the year 1865 Daswandhi made a gift of the whole of his property, in equal third shares, to (1) his daughter, Musammat Jiwan, (2) Lal Din (the son of Musammat Jiwan), and (3) Kala (the son of his daughter, Musammat Karm Bhari, who had died prior to the date of the gift). These gifts were unsuccessfully challenged by Daswandhi's collaterals, their suit being dismissed on the ground that they were too remotely related to the donor to contest his action. Daswandhi died in 1870, and Lal Din in 1877. The latter left no issue and the third share gifted to him passed on his death to his mother, Musammat Jiwan.

Upon the death of Musammat Jiwan the collaterals of Daswandhi brought the present suit in which they claim to recover the lands gifted to Musammat Jiwan and Lal Din from Musammat Mehr Bibi, who is in present possession. The ground upon which the claim is based is that the gift to Musammat Jiwan and her son enured only for the benefit of the donees and their lineal descendants, and that as neither Lal Din nor Musammat Jiwan had left any such issue surviving, the property reverted, under the well-recognised and general rule of customary law, to the agnatic heirs of the donors.

The defendants impleaded were Musammat Mehr Bibi (the widow of Chiragh) and Bhulla, the husband of her deceased daughter, and their defence to the suit was two-fold. In the first place, they pleaded that Musammat Jiwan had in her life-time adopted Chiragh Din (the son of her husband by her co-wife) and that consequently Chiragh Din's widow, Musammat Mehr Bibi, was entitled to hold possession for her life, and in the second place, that Bhulla was also one of Daswandhi's collaterals and that in his presence plaintiffs had no right to sue for possession.

These were the only pleas urged by defendants, and the District Judge decided both in favour of plaintiffs. Bhulla accepted this decision and preferred no appeal to the Divisional Judge, but Musammat Mehr Bibi did appeal and urged that plaintiffs' claim to Lal Din's share was time-barred, that Musammat Jiwan and Lal Din had paid off certain mortgage charges and that consequently plaintiffs could not recover the land without paying defendant, who was the representative of Musammat Jiwan and Lal Din, the said amount, and that Chiragh Din had been proved to be the adopted son of Musammat Jiwan.

There was obviously no force in any of these contentions. Musammat Jiwan, as the mother of Lal Din, would in the natural course of things be allowed by the collateral heirs of Daswandhi to enjoy for her life the property given to her son, and her possession of it was clearly permissive and in no sense adverse to plaintiffs. Nor again would any adoption by her of Chiragh Din (a total stranger to the family of Daswandhi) have had the effect of making him her heir to the prejudice of her father's agnatic heirs.

As a matter of fact, the District Judge has found, and quite rightly, that there is no evidence whatever to support the allegation that Musammat Jiwan adopted the son of her co-wife, but even if she had done so, it is clear that her action could not possibly have affected plaintiffs' rights to succeed by reversion on failure of her lineal descendants.

The plea that Musammat Mehr Bibi was entitled to be reimbursed for moneys paid by Musammat Jiwan to redeem certain mortgages is a mere after-thought and utterly untenable in any event. Chiragh Din and his widow are not the heirs of Musammat Jiwan, and apart from the objection that there is no proof that Musammat Jiwan spent any money in redeeming mortgages on the land in suit, Musammat Mehr Bibi would have no right to claim compensation for any such expenditure, had it been established.

So far as Musammat Mehr Bibi's own pleadings and grounds of appeal were concerned, there can be no doubt that her defence to the claim must have failed and the decree of the District Judge has been upheld. But the Divisional Judge set up an entirely new case for her, and himself evolved a line of defence which has never suggested itself to either defendants or their legal advisers. He has assumed, in the absence of any evidence and purely on what he regards as probabilities, that Daswandhi, when he made the gift to the three donees in 1865, "intended to give them a joint tenancy, with remainder to the survivor or her issue in the event of the descendants of either becoming extinct." Having assumed this fact, and having given Daswandhi the credit for creating an estate of a highly technical nature, an estate probably unknown to the personal law of Daswandhi [Jogeswar Narain Das v. Ram Chandra Dutt (1)] and most assuredly unknown to Daswandhi himself, the learned Judge, in defiance of the pleadings and the facts upon the record, proceeds to import into the case a highly technical rule of English conveyancing and to hold that Kala, the sole surviving donee under Daswandhi's gifts, is in law the rightful heir, by survivorship, to Musammat Jiwan, and that as long as he lives, plaintiffs can have no locus standi to sue for possession of any part of the property originally given by Daswandhi. Upon this extraordinary ground the learned Judge has dismissed plaintiffs' suit and has brushed aside, as a matter of no possible moment, the very important fact that Kala has never asserted any right to the property in suit. He has, further, completely ignored the actual pleadings of the parties and has dismissed the suit by applying to it a technical rule of English conveyancing (and that, too, erroneously), without giving the plaintiffs an opportunity of showing that Daswandhi, an uneducated Punjab agriculturist, could not possibly have had that rule in his mind when he made the gifts, in distinct shares, to the three donees. Had plaintiffs had this opportunity, they could have pointed to the fact that when Lal Din died, Kala did not take a half share with Musammat Jiwan in the deceased's property, whereas if the Divisional Judge's view is correct, Kala and Musammat Jiwan must have succeeded jointly to Lal Din's property.

We must further take exception to the remarks of the Divisional Judge when he says that the gift to Musammat Jiwan stands as it did when the collaterals originally sued to have it set aside, and that it cannot be impugned now any more than it could be then. Plantiffs do not now impugn the gift. Their contention is that the donees (Musammat Jiwan and Lal Din) have since that litigation died without issue and that under the ordinary rule of customary law, the property reverts to them as the ultimate heirs of the donors. It is idle, therefore, for the learned Judge to observe that what was done and decided in the former case cannot now be undone. Plaintiffs do not ask for anything to be undone. They accept the previous decision but allege that facts are now entirely different, and obviously their contention is correct.

In the circumstances it is to be regretted that the Divisional Judge went out of his way to assert that it was "deplorable that plaintiffs should be induced to file suits like this and waste money on them because their legal advisers do not grasp the elementary principles of law," and to stigmatise this as "a meddlesome suit." These observations were most unfair to plaintiffs and their legal advisers and were quite uncalled-for and unjustifiable.

In our opinion, plaintiffs were fully justified in preferring their present claim, and their suit must have succeeded had the learned Judge himself adjudicated upon it in the ordinary way and with reference to elementary principles of pleadings.

We accept the appeal and, setting aside the decree of the Divisional Judge, we restore that of the District Judge. Respondent must pay costs throughout.

Appeal accepted.

Easements Act (V of 1882), s. 7, ills. (h), (i), distinction between—Natural stream, test and essentials of—Owner of land below, right of, to dam back natural stream—Riparian owner, right of—Damming of natural stream to better cultivate, whether ordinary agricultural operation.

Where a stream has a continuous flow at the beginning but subsequently diversifies itself over a vast area of land, it is a natural stream and the owner of the adjacent land below has no right to put a dam across it to the injury and damage of the upper land-owners.

Per Wallis, Offg. C. J.—As the erection of a bund to dam back the water of a natural stream is an infringement of a natural right, as declared in section 7, illustration (h) of the Easements Act, the water of such a stream passing in a defined channel should be allowed to flow without material alteration in its quantity or direction.

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—The essential attributes of a natural stream are that it must have a fairly defined course; it must move; and its water must be capable of identification. It need not always be confined with banks, nor need it have a continuous flow or a width of particular dimensions.

The distinction between illustrations (h) and (i) of section 7 of the Easements Act is this: In the former case the water must flow in a natural stream, in the latter, although there may be no defined channel the water must have a regulated course. The one deals with the developments of a stream, while the other deals with its beginnings. At the beginning of a stream, it is not to be expected that water will flow within well-defined bounds.

It is open to a person to protect himself against extraordinary floods. The right of any other person is not in question in such a case, as each one has a right to use means to prevent a possible sudden danger.

Every riparian owner should so conduct operations on his property as not to affect injuriously those above and below him.

To put up a dam to enable one to better cultivate his fields is not an ordinary agricultural operation.

Appeal against the decree of the District Court of Guntur in Original Suit No. 25 of 1908.

The Government Pleader, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—The plaintiff is the Secretary of State, the first defendant the Rajah of Venkatagiri, and other defendants are ryots of the village of Vasapallipadu in the Guntur District. The suit is brought for the removal of a bund or dam placed by the defendant across what is alleged by the plaintiff to be a natural stream of salt water, known as the Nallavagu, which has the effect of throwing back the saline waters of the stream on to the lands of the Government village Allur and sending it into the irrigation tanks of the village to the injury of the wet crops raised with the tank water. The District Judge has given the plaintiff a decree and the 1st defendant appeals. The bund in question was put up first in 1896 and was removed by the orders of the Divisional Officer at the end of 1897. It was again put up in 1904 and after some correspondence this suit was instituted for its removal in 1908. The main defence put forward was that the Nallavagu was not a stream flowing in a defined course at this point. Witnesses were examined and cross-examined at very great length to prove this, and a very lengthy argument based on their evidence was addressed to us by the learned Vakil for the appellant who, on the other hand, passed very lightly over the documentary evidence for the twelve years preceding the filing of the suit. This is not surprising, because reference to the correspondence which passed and to the statements which were taken from both sides during that period shows that this contention was raised for the first time in the first defendant's written statement and that till then no one had ever doubted that it was a natural stream.

The upper reaches of the Nallavagu admittedly form a natural stream, though like other streams in this part of the country it only flows during the north-east monsoon, from October to December, and for a short time after heavy showers at other periods of the year. Some three or four miles higher up than the suit bund the stream bifurcates, one branch taking a north-easterly course and finding its way into the Buckingham Canal, which flows parallel with the coast, while the branch now in question admittedly flows in an easterly or south-easterly direction down to a point above two miles distant from the place where the bund was erected and then, according to the defendants, ceases to flow in a defined channel and spreads over the surface of the country, whereas according to the plaintiff, it pursues its course to the site of the bund and before the bund was erected, flowed southward through the wet lands of the defendant's Vasapallipadu village and ultimately found its way into the Buckingham Canal further south.

Below the point C in the plan Exhibit 1A, where the defendants say the Nallavagu ceases to flow in a defined channel, the water is admittedly confined on the right bank and does not overflow to the south over the Vasapallipadu lands until it reaches the site of the bund. If it spread out at all it must, therefore, have been to the north and if there was nothing on the north to contain it, it must obviously have spread over the country until it was absorbed and very little water could have found its way to the bund site. On the other hand if, as appears to have been the case, the natural configuration of the country to the north was such that saline water admittedly flowing down the Vagu to the point C was subsequently directed to the bund site whence it flowed down through the defendants' lands, this would appear to be sufficient to satisfy the definition of a natural stream in the explanation to section 7 of the Easements Act, viz., "a stream flowing by the operation of nature only and in a natural and known course." I confess that it appears to us very largely a case of res ipsa loquitur, seeing that admittedly the saline waters brought down by the Vagu found their way to the site of the bund and then before its erection flowed down into the wet lands of the defendants.

How long this state of things had existed is not perhaps very material. It may be that the other branch became silted up and that in consequence a larger volume of water passed down the branch in question than had formerly been the case. The fact that the northern branch is clearly marked in the survey map of 1862 while the other is not, makes this probable. There are near the point of bifurcation the remains of a bund which is said to have been erected about 1872 and to have fallen into ruins or been dismantled about 1879. This bund, no doubt, had the effect of sending most of the water down the north-east branch. According to the earliest statement of the Allur ryots in 1896 it was removed or allowed to fall into disrepair because the ryots on the north-east branch objected that it caused their lands to be flooded. This again is not improbable, as in the correspondence which passed prior to suit there is a letter of the 1st defendant, Exhibit I, in which it is stated that the erection of a similar bund would have that effect. Whatever the origin of the south-east branch of the Nallavagu it seems perfectly clear that in the rainy season it was flowing in a natural stream at the site of the suit bund in 1896, when the bund was first erected, and for many years previously. The statement, Exhibit N taken by P. W. No. 4 from the Vasapallipadu ryots on 14th August 1896 in answer to the complaint of the Allur ryots, shows that there was then no question of its not being a natural stream. They say they were present when the officer inspected the bund and the course taken by the Nallavagu, and describe the Nallavagu as following south of the bund through their wet lands forming marshes or grass-grown hollows. Exhibit L2 is the report of the officer and Exhibit L15 the plan submitted by him in which the course of the Vagu is clearly shown both above and below the bund. The subsequent petition of the Vasapallipadu ryots, Exhibit L5, dated 25th September 1896, denied that they had "newly erected a bund to the said Nallavagu." Similar statements by them are to be found in L10, dated the 6th January 1897. Exhibit L13, dated 6th August 1897, is an order for the removal of the bund. The bund was removed on 26th September 1897, Exhibit O. 2, dated 10th October 1897, is a complaint of the Allur ryots that the bund was being re-erected. The order for the removal of the bund was set aside as irregular on 9th December 1897, Exhibit J7, and nothing more is heard of it until Exhibit L16 dated 22nd September 1904, which is a complaint of its having been recently re-erected. Exhibit L17 is the Revenue Inspector's report and Exhibit L18 the plan he prepared at the time. Exhibit R of 14th November 1904 is the reply by the 1st defendant to the letter written to him by the Sub-Collector of Ongole complaining of the erection of the bund to divert the course of the Nallavagu. In his reply the 1st defendant refers to the damage done "by the Nallavagu stream" to the wet lands of the Vasapallipadu village which are below the suit bund. Exhibit IA is a plan prepared shortly after on 20th November 1904 by the Assistant Engineer. The defence relies very much on this plan, because it shows the waters as spreading out at the point C about two miles above the bund, but this plan, which was made in the middle of the north-east monsoon, shows the state of things then existing consequent on the erection of the bund which, as the Executive Engineer says in his evidence, had the effect of throwing back the waters of the Vagu, raising their level to a considerable distance higher up the stream and making them overflow the dry lands on the north. The same observation applies to the evidence of Mr. Pogson, the architect and surveyor called by the defendants as their 1st witness. He visited the place during the rainy season immediate before the trial and observed the state of things caused by the bund during heavy rain, a state of things which would have been very different if the bund had not been there. In my opinion the admission made by the defendants in the correspondence, the plans prepared in 1896 and 1904, and the admitted facts of the case all show conclusively that the Nallavagu flowed in a natural stream at the place where the suit bund was erected, and I think this is also the effect of the oral evidence which I do not propose to examine in detail. If this be so, the erection of the suit bund was admittedly an infringement of the natural rights of the plaintiff as declared in section 7, illustration (h), of the Easements Act that the water of the natural stream passing through the lands of his Allur village in a defined natural channel should be allowed to flow within his limits without material alteration in quantity or direction.

Even if there was no natural stream flowing in a defined natural channel through the plaintiff's lands adjoining the site of the bund, which was erected just over the border line in the 1st defendant's lands, I do not think this would make any difference, because I think the bund would equally be an infringement of the plaintiff's natural rights as the owner of the upper land that water naturally rising in or falling on such land and not passing in defined channels should be allowed by the owner of adjacent lower land to run naturally thereto. The defendants say that, if there is no natural stream, they are not bound to allow the water to run down on to their land and quote Mahamahopadhyaya Runga Chariar v. Municipal Council of Kumbakonam (1). That decision proceeded on an alleged conflict between the natural right, recognised in illustration (a) to section 7, of every owner of land in a town to build on such land subject to any Municipal law for the time being in force, and the natural right defined in illustration (i) of every owner of upper land against the owner of adjacent lower land in respect of water naturally running in or falling on such land and not flowing in defined channels. Illustration (a) does not apply to the present case and the question decided in that case does not arise here, but the defendants rely on an observation of Subramania Iyer, J., at page 546 that the right mentioned in illustration (i) is "a right only in the sense that the passage of water from the higher to the lower close gives no right of action to the owner of the latter, that being but the result of the operation of the laws of nature." I don't think this passage should be taken apart from its context. As a general proposition it appears to be unsupported by authority and with great respect I am unable to accept it. To say, as the defendants do, that, while the plaintiff as owner of the upper land in the open country has a natural right that water naturally running in or falling on his land and not flowing in defined channels should be allowed by the owner of adjacent lower land to run naturally thereto, the latter has a right to erect just over the border of his land a barrier which has the effect of throwing the water back upon the land of the upper owner, appears to me to be in direct contradiction to the language of the section as well as to the law on which the section is founded. In Menzies v. Earl of Breadalbane (2) the Lord Chancellor cited with approval the following passage from the Digest (Dig. 39 t. 3. 1, 1), "opus quod quis fecit ut aquam excluderet, quae exundante palude in agrum ejus refluere solet, si ea palus aqua pluvia ampliatur, eaque aqua replusa eo opere agris vicini noceat, aquae pluviae actione cogetur tollere", that is to say, the action equae pluviae or of rain water will lie against a landowner for the removal of a work erected by him to keep water off his land which naturally overflows on to it from a marsh, when in time of heavy rain the water forced back by the work so constructed does damage to the lands of the adjoining owner. To the same effect are the decisions Broder v. Saillard (3) and Hurdman v. North-Eastern Railway Co. (4), which was approved in Whalley v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. (5). The present seems to be one of the class of cases referred to by Brett, M. R., in that case at page 136, "where your property is subject to the defect that, unless you can prevent the injury which the ordinary course of nature will bring upon it by transferring it to your neighbour's property, your property must suffer as the natural consequence of its position." In such a case, as pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, an owner who to cure the defect to his own property were to turn the water on to his neighbour's land would be liable to an injunction and damages. I do not think that this can be said to be the case of an extraordinary peril coming on the defendant's lands, because the evidence is that for at least more than 30 years before suit, and possibly very much longer, these saline waters have found their way in times of heavy rain to the site of the suit bund and flowed on to the defendant's lands. No authority has been cited to us to show that the fact that natural water carries certain amount of saline matter in solution which renders it injurious to crops in any way, takes it out of the law governing the distribution of natural surface water, and I think that cases such as Rex v. Pagham Levels Commissioner (6) and Nield v. London and North Railway Company (7) have no application to the present case. The Government Pleader does not support the award of damages and the decree will be modified accordingly. Otherwise, in my opinion, the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs. The defendants will be restrained from diverting or obstructing the course of the south-eastern branch of Nallavagu stream at the site of the suit bund or elsewhere so as to prevent the same from flowing in its natural course past the site of the said bund, and they will be directed to remove so much of the suit bund or any other work as may wholly or partially divert or interfere with the flow of the south-eastern branch of the Nallavagu stream in its natural course.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The suit is by the Secretary of State for India for the removal of a bund erected by the 1st defendant, the Rajah of Venkatagiri, and his tenants across a stream known as the Nallavagu. Both parties admit that this stream originates in the Ongole Taluk and that up to A (I shall refer to plan I A, as it was filed for the defendants and as its accuracy as representing the state of affairs as it existed at the time of its preparation in 1904 was not questionod by the plaintiff), it has a defined course. The 1st defendant contends that from A it proceeds in a north-easterly direction as a well-defined stream, and that it is not a stream in its passage in the south-westerly direction from A. It is common ground that there is a bifurcation at this point. It was finally admitted by the defendants that from A to C in the south-easterly course, Nallavagu has all the requisites of a running stream; they allege that beyond C, it diffuses itself over a large area. It is not denied that despite this diffusion, the water of Nallavagu finds its way through depressions into a marsh and that ultimately its waters empty themselves into the Buckingham Canal. The defendants state that from A to C the distance is a mile and a quarter and from C to the Buckingham Canal, it is four miles. They say that this irregular flow of water from C caused considerable damage to their crops as it was saline, and that in order to enable them to cultivate their fields to the best advantage they put up the dam complained of. They do not dispute that the effect of this dam is to throw a great quantity of water on the lands of the plaintiff during the flood seasons, but they demur to having caused any actual damage to the crops grown on plaintiff's lands. The District Judge came to the conclusion that the defendants were not entitled to raise a dam and directed its removal. He did not find any actual damage, and awarded nominal damages. The first defendant has appealed.

The first question for consideration is whether Nallavagu is a natural stream in its south-easterly course. The evidence is not very full and definite, but after giving my careful consideration to the arguments advanced by the learned Vakils for the appellant I have come to the conclusion that it is a natural stream. It was pointed out that in the surveys carried on by the plaintiff, the lands through which Nallavagu passes up to C are not entered as river-bed, whereas in its north-easterly direction this has been done. This may show that from A to C the outlet has been more recent than from A to B. For more than 30 years from 1878, this part of Nallavagu has been in existence and yet the survey officers have not recorded the numbers through which it passes as river-bed. I do not think that much importance should be attached to this omission. I see no reason to disbelieve the evidence of P. W. No. 4. He was a Revenue Inspector of Ongole in 1896. It was in that year that the defendants first put up a dam across the Nallavagu very near the site of the present one. He inspected the locality and submitted a report (Exhibit L2). He also submitted a sketch of the course of the stream (Exhibit L5). This plan was not made by a professional man and its very imperfections impress me with its truth and honesty. The legal significance which would attach to the Nallavagu, if it were regarded as a natural stream, was unknown to him. The report and the plan may be said practically to be ante litem motam, and I am preparted to act upon both. The plan traces a very defined course in 1896, and is confirmed by the report Exhibit L2. In the witness box he has given evidence in support of the existence of the course of the stream. P. W. No. 6, the karnam of Allur, one of the villages through which the stream passes, and who was one of the signatories to report Exhibit L in 1896, supports the Revenue Inspector. I see no reason to discredit this evidence. I have rejected from consideration the evidence of the other villagers, because they are interested. As against the evidence of P. W. No. 4 and P. W. No. 6 there is the evidence of D. W. No. 3, the Tahsildar under the defendant. He does not give any definite evidence and is not supported by any record which he has made. The other evidence for the defendants is that of persons who are interested in the result of the litigation. I do not place any reliance on it. My conclusion is that up to the year 1896, Nallavagu flowed in a south-easterly direction in a defined channel. It may be, as contended by the appellants, that the branching off in this direction was only about 1878. However, the existence of a ruined masonry bund at A is against this contention. It is amply proved that in or about the year 1872 a masonry dam was put up near the point of bifurcation either by or at the instance of the 1st defendant. Unless the stream had been flowing south, it was hardly likely that such a permanent construction to divert its course would have been thought of. I am inclined to think that this south-easterly course of the Nallavagu must have existed even prior to 1872. At any rate it is clear that from 1878 it had been flowing in this direction. In that year the evidence shows that the dam was either breached or washed away; about that time the branch in the north-westerly direction was becoming silted up. Consequently a large volume of water must find its way from A to C and downwards.

Even if I feel any doubt regarding this conclusion of mine, I am satisfied that on the facts admitted by the defendants, the Nallavagu in the south-easterly direction was a natural stream in the eye of the law. As stated by me already, it is conceded that from A to C in this direction it has all the requisites of a natural stream. It is from this point that a defined course is denied to it. It is said that it has no banks, that it does not pass within specified limits, and that it has not a marked flow. These, it is argued by the learned Vakils for the appellant, are essential to constitute a stream. It is in evidence that from C the Nallavagu passes through zamin lands at first, thence through Government lands and finally spreads itself out over a large extent of zamin ands. It is to prevent this diffusion that the dam, according to the defendants, was erected. It is admitted by the witnesses whose lands will be submerged if the dam were removed that before the year 1896, the water of the Nallavagu found its way, though not within banks on either side, into a marsh nearly three miles lower down and ultimately emptied itself into the Buckingham Canal. See D. W. No. 2 at page 244, D. W. No. 3 at page 248, D. W. No. 4 at page 251, D. W. No. 6 at page 263, D. W. No. 14 at page 276 and D. W. No. 10 at page 265. This last witness is 70 years of age. He says: "A portion of the water of this southerly branch flows over the wet lands of Vasapallipadu and empties itself into the Buckingham Canal,—I have known this for the last 50 years." There is absolutely no reason why this witness should be disbelieved. The evidence above set forth establishes that up to point C for a mile and a quarter from the point of bifurcation there is a defined stream, from that point the water moves and is not stagnant, it spreads itself out over a large area, and ultimately finds its way into the Buckingham Canal. In accepting this evidence on the side of the defendants, it must be allowed that from point C up to the Buckingham Canal, the course is not well-defined, there are no visible bunds restricting the flow of the water. Do these facts take away from the character which the Nallavagu has up to C?

The question to be considered is, what are the attributes of a natural stream? Lord Tenderdon in Rex v. Oxfordshire (8) said that "water flowing in a channel between banks more or less defined" formed a water-course. It has since been decided that there need be no continuous flow of water. Angell in his book quotes from an American decision which says: "It is not essential to a water-course that the banks should be absolutely unchangeable, the flow constant, the size uniform, or the waters entirely unmixed with earth or flowing with any fixed velocity: but the law does not and cannot fix the limits of variation in these particulars" (Angell on Water-Courses, page 4, VII Edition). The facts of this case are on all fours with Gillet v. Johnson (9); Macomber v. Godfrey (10) quoted by Angell in the footnote (1) at page 3. Farnham collects all the authorities bearing on the question and in Volume II, page 1564, points out that the term "water-course" has been extended to 'depressions in...a prairie country which drain large extents of territory of enormous quantities of surface water, although they have no well-defined channels or banks, but still are well-defined water-courses for surface water." The opinion of Kelly, C. B., in Holker v. Porritt (11) fully supports this view although in the Appellate Court [Holker v. Porritt (12)] the point was left open. Whitehead v. Parks (13) takes the same view. The passages in Volume 40 of the American Encyclopædia to which our attention was drawn by the learned Vakils for the appellant are somewhat contradictory in their character. It often happens that the various States of the United States adopt different interpretations of well-known terms. It is not safe to rely upon isolated passages to be found in this volume for the definition of water course. Farnham draws attention to these conflicting views and states the general trend of the American Law on the subject. I accept his statement as expressing the view which finds most favour with eminent Judges in that country. Reason and principle are in favour of the view suggested. A volume of water which has acquired a distinctive character as a stream up to a point does not lose it by the fact that in the rest of its course it is not well-defined. From an examination of the authorities the attributes of a natural stream may be thus summarised. It must have a fairly defined course. It must move. Its water must be capable of identification. It need not always be confined with banks. It need not have a continuous flow. Its width need not be of particular dimensions. It is by these tests that a natural stream has to be judged. I am of opinion that in the case before us the Nallavagu satisfies all the positive requirements above mentioned and is a natural stream. The recent decision in Villuri Adinarayana v. Polimera Ramudu (14) practically agrees with this conclusion of mine.

It was argued by the learned Government Pleader that even apart from the question of the Nallavagu being a natural stream, the action of the defendants in putting up the dam so as to flood the plaintiff's lands with saline water is actionable. The language of illustration (i) to section 7 of the Easements Act is relied on, while illustration (h) deals with water in a running stream. Illustration (i) is limited to water rising or falling on the land of the upper owner. I have felt some doubts whether this illustration is not confined to cases where a spring has its origin in the upper land or serves as a bed for a waterfall. In Domat's Civil Law, the rule is stated in these words:—If waters have their course regulated from one ground to another, whether it be by the nature of the place, or by some regulation or by a title or by an ancient possession, the proprietors of the said ground cannot innovate anything as to the ancient course of the waters. Thus he who has the upper grounds cannot change the course of the waters, either by turning it some other way or rendering it more rapid, or making any other change in it to the prejudice of the owner of the lower grounds. Neither can he who has the lower estate do anything that may hinder his grounds from receiving the waters which they ought to receive and that in the manner which has been regulated. Farnham in commenting upon this rule says that even in regard to surface water there must be a well-regulated flow, before interference with it becomes actionable. In the Digest the rule is stated slightly differently (See rule 110, Ware's Roman Water Law, page 57). But as pointed out by the Lord Chancellor in Menzies v. Breadalbane (2) there are conflicting views on this subject. The collection of authorities made by Mr. Ware shows it. Under these circumstances, I do not feel justified in presuming that the Indian Legislature intended illustration (i) to represent the views of Ulpian in Digest 39, t. 3, l, 1. The distinction between illustrations (h) and (i), in my opinion, amounts to this. In the former case the water must flow in a natural stream. In the latter although there may be no defined channel, the water must have a regulated course. The one deals with the developments of a stream while the other deals with its beginnings. At the beginning of a stream, it is not to be expected that water will flow within well-defined bounds. Even in such a state the upper owner is entitled to say that its natural course should not be obstructed provided the water moves on regularly. It is true that in Hurdman v. North-Eastern Railway Company (4) Cotton, L. J., held that a lower owner is not entitled to protect himself against the flow of rain water falling on the upper land, but the learned Lord Justice would, I think, exempt the carrying on of agricultural operations from this rule. I do not think that that case affects the question we have to decide. In that case, a wall was erected in the course of a building which had the effect of totally shutting out the drainage of the water for the field above. I shall, therefore, not rest my decision upon illustration (i). I think this case is governed by illustration (h). I prefer to decide this case on the footing that there is a stream. Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Iyer argues that the defendant was justified in putting up a dam on his own land to save his property from being inundated by the flow of the saline water. He draws a distinction between preventing a nuisance before it reaches a man's land and taking steps to free himself from it after it has entered his land. In the former case, the action will be justifiable though it may cause damage to the upper owner. In the latter case, care will have to be taken to see that the upper owner is not injured. I fail to see any real distinction between the two classes of cases. The cases which were quoted, to which I shall presently refer, relate to extraordinary floods. It has been held that it is open to a person to protect himself against such dangers in anticipation. The right of any other person is not in question in such cases. Each one has a right to use means to prevent a possible sudden danger. The decision of Bramwell, B., in Nield v. The London and North-Western Railway Co. (7) has been much relied on. It is stated in that judgment that "the flood is a common enemy against which every man has a right to defend himself," and that "the law allows a kind of reasonable selfishness in such matters," but the sentences which immediately follow make a reservation in cases "where there is a natural outlet for natural water." This case, therefore, does not apply to conditions where the ordinary flow of water in a natural stream is concerned. It was argued that as the upper owner will be damaged by the dam only during the season of flood, this case is within the rule relating to extraordinary floods. The fact that a larger volume of water will year after year flow in a channel during well-known periods will not constitute the water an extraordinary flood. There are very few perennial streams in this country; and the extension of the doctrine of extraordinary floods to streams which during particular seasons let out a large quantity of water would render the position of the upper riparian owner entirely insecure. I think the principle of Nield v. London and North-Western Railway Co. (7) should be confined to cases where the anticipated danger is occasional, abnormal and unusual. Menzies v. Breadalbane (2), which Bramwell, B., quotes with approval in Nield v. The London and North-Western Railway Co. (7), lays down quite distinctly that a riparian proprietor should not erect mounds on his premises to protect himself from ordinary floods if the result of so doing will be to cause damage to the proprietor on the opposite bank. The Lord Chancellor points out in this case that under the Scottish Law, which follows the Roman Law in this respect, "though the river threatens to change its channel you cannot protect yourself to the prejudice of the opposite proprietor." As regards the law of England, he says there can be no doubt on the point. The various cases to which we have been referred in the course of the argument can be grouped under one or the other of these two cases. I shall very briefly notice them. Rex v. Pagham Level Commissioners (6) is followed in Nield v. London and North-Western Railway Co. (7).

The defence erected in that case was intended as a protection against inroads of the sea which, in the language of Lord Tenderden, L. J., was a common enemy. In Attorney-General v. Earl of Londsdale (15) Vice-Chancellor Malines says that the principle of protecting mischief against a common enemy has no application to natural streams. The case of Rylands v. Fletcher (16) and Madras Railway Company v. Zamindar of Carvetinagaram (17) belong to the same category. On the other hand in Miner v. Gilmour (18) Lord Kingsdown laid down that a riparian owner should so use his rights as not to interfere with those of other proprietors either above or below him. This has been accepted as the correct exposition of the law on the subject in Orr Ewing v. Colquhoun (19). In this case Lord Blackburn after an elaborate discussion of the question states the law to be: "the owner of the banks of a non-navigable river has an interest in having the water above him flow down to him and in having the water below him flow away from him, as it has been wont to do." Whalley v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (5) lays down that although a man may not bring the water on his land, he has no right to protect his property by transferring the mischief from his own land to that of another. These principles have never been departed from in the subsequent cases in the English Courts. In this country where facilities for the drainage of water have not been yet provided to the same extent as in England, it is necessary to see that the owners of property on the banks of streams are not allowed to gain advantages to themselves at the expense of others; nowhere is there greater need for the strict enforcement of the doctrine that each riparian owner should so conduct operations on his property as not to affect injuriously those above and below him. We are governed in most cases by considerations of mamul and usage and it would lead to disturbances to allow any one of the owners to introduce innovations which would render his neighour's exercise of ordinary rights of property infructuous. Mr. Ramachandra Iyer said that by erecting a dam his client was not doing anything extraordinary;

he was only engaged in agricultural operations. I think the learned Government Pleader is right in pointing out that the putting up of a dam to enable the defendants to better cultivate their fields is not an ordinary agricultural operation.

There are not very many Indian cases dealing with the question. Gopal Reddi v. Chenna Reddi (20) is only an illustration of the principle laid down in Nield v. London and North-Western Railway Company (7). Mr. Justice Shephard in following Rex v. Pagham Level Commissioners (6) has not adverted to the distinction which has been maintained in the later case in Attornley-General v. Earl of Londsdale (15). Subramania Iyer, J., in Mahamahopadhyaya Ranga Chariar v. Municipal Council of Kumbakonam (1) lays down that where there is a conflict of rights between two owners, that one who wants to exercise his ordinary rights should be protected although by that exercise he may injure his neighbour. The case itself related to the erection of buildings in an urban area. Text-writers and Courts have recognised that in such areas, it would be injurious to public welfare that a person should be prohibited from building because he will thereby cause danger to his neighbour. There is the sanction of Roman Law for this position. See Farnham, Volume III, page 2607 and 40 American Encyclopædia, page 643. Even in such a case, it is said that some provision by way of drain, should be made in order that the neighbour may not suffer by an overflow. I do not think the learned Judge intended to lay down that the principle regarding conflict of rights should be extended to agricultural areas in rural parts. If that was the intention, I must respectfully differ from such a proposition.

In Sankarappa Naicker v. Pari Naicker (21) Sankaran Nair and Oldfield, JJ., limited the application of this rule to urban areas. I entirely agree with that conclusion.

My conclusions are that the Nallavagu is a natural stream and that the defendant is not entitled to put up the dam complained of, as it would result in inflicting injury upon the plaintiff.

Having regard to the decisions in Abdul Hakim v. Gonesh Dutt (22); Iman Ali v. Poresh Mundul (23) the only declaration the plaintiff is entitled to is that the defendant should not put up a bund which will have the effect of submerging the plaintiff's lands. If he can adopt measures by which he can protect himself without causing an injury to the plaintiff's lands, he is entitled to do so.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115—Revision—Rejection of amendment application—No irregularity—High Court, power of, to interfere—Jurisdiction.

When a Subordinate Judge, holding that the expression "future interest" used in a decree means interest from the date of decision and not from the date of the institution of the suit, disallows an application for the amendment of the decree, he commits no irregularity; and whether his decision is right or wrong, the High Court has no jurisdiction to interfere in revision.

Revision against the decree of the Officating Subordinate Judge of Shahjahanpur, dated the 26th of June 1914.

FACTS.—The applicants brought a suit on a mortgage and claimed Rs. 16,851-1-6 for principal and interest up to the date of the suit. They also asked for future interest. The Court decreed the claim with costs and six per cent. per annum future interest. The office prepared a decree awarding Rs. 16,851-1-6 and costs and declared the same to be due on the date on which the suit was decided. It also allowed interest on this amount from the date of decision to the date of realization. The plaintiffs put in an application for amendment of the decree contending that they were also allowed interest from the date of the suit. The Subordinate Judge rejected the application. The plaintiffs applied in revision to the High Court.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, for the Respondents, raised a preliminary objection to the effect that no revision lay. The lower Court first passed a decree under Order XXXIV, rule 4. It decided by its judgment that future interest with the principal amount claimed and costs was decreed to the plaintiffs-applicants. The decree was framed by the lower Court in accordance with the judgment. An appeal lay against that decree if there was any grievance to the plaintiffs-applicants. The order under revision was simply an order construing the decree and the judgment, and deciding that the decree was in accordance with the judgment. The lower Court had the jurisdiction to decide the matter in any way and no revision could lie against such an order.

Mr. Lalit Mohan Banerjee, for the Applicants:—The lower Court was bound to prepare the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 4. Under the provisions of that rule, the lower Court was bound to award to the plaintiffs in the decree the interest from the date of the suit. The Court was bound to grant the interest from the date of the suit at the contractual rate. This was so held in Musammat Rajwanta Kuar v. Sham Narain Singh (1) and the lower Court was bound to interpret the decree in a way which would give effect to the provisions of law. Failure to do so was failure to exercise jurisdiction and if the lower Court refused to amend the decree and to interpret it according to law, it failed to exercise jurisdiction and its order was open to revision by the High Court.

He relied in Raghunath Das v. Raj Kumar (2).

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of an order of the Subordinate Judge of Shahjahanpore declining to amend a decree. The applicants suing on a mortgage claimed Rs. 16,851-1-6 on account of principal and interest up to the date of suit. They asked for future interest, that is, interest after the date of the institution of the suit. The Court "decreed the claim with costs, and six per cent. per annum future interest." The office prepared a decree which declared that Rs. 16,851-1-6 on account of principal and interest and Rs. 204 on account of costs, total Rs. 18,055-1-6, were due to the plaintiffs on January 9th, 1914, that is the date on which the suit was decided and allowed the plaintiffs' interest on the last-mentioned sum from that date till realization at the rate of six per cent. per annum. The plaintiffs by an application which appears to have been prepared on January 20th, 1914, but was not filed until April 21st, 1914, asked the Court to amend the decree, which they said was not in accordance with the judgment. They contended that the judgment allowed interest from the date of the suit up to the date of realization on the amount claimed. The Subordinate Judge says: "From the perusal of the judgment it appears that the Court did not allow interest from the institution up to the date of the decree and, therefore, the decree is all right," and the application was disallowed. Thus it appears the Subordinate Judge construed the expression "future interest" to mean interest from the date of decision, and not from the date of the institution of the suit. He may have been wrong and the Court when deciding the case may have intended to allow interest from the date of the institution of the suit; but it is impossible to say that the Subordinate Judge has acted irregularly. He had jurisdiction to decide wrongly as well as to decide rightly; and whether he was right or whether he was wrong, we are unable to entertain this application in revision. We, therefore, dismiss it with costs.

Application dismissed.

The condition in a varam agreement which obliges the ryot to cultivate the land in due season is not unreasonable, provided that it is not read as insuring the rent in all seasons. In case such condition is not observed, the measure of damages is the average yield of neighbouring land.

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, against the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Madras (East), in Small Cause Suit No. 493 of 1914.

Mr. K. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Petitioner.

The Hon'ble Sir V. C. Deshikachariar, for Mr. T. Rangachariar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The condition in the patta tendered which obliges the ryot to cultivate the land in due season cannot be said to be unreasonable in a varam agreement, provided, of course, that it is not read as insuring the rent in all seasons.

Here I am bound by the finding that the defendant might have cultivated the land had he closen to do so.

The measure of damages applied by the Subordinate Judge, the average yield of neighbouring land, is in my opinion the right one.

The petition is dismissed with costs.

Central Provinces Tenancy Act (XI of 1898), ss. 85, 115—Tenant can save one holding if unable to save another—Surrender by tenant, effect of, on his mortgagee —Partition—Order of Settlement Officer, whether necessary—One holding could be split up into several by consent of landlord and his tenants.

A holding can be split up by a landlord and his tenants with mutual consent and without the order of a Settlement Officer. If a partition made by two persons interested in two portions of a holding is accepted by the landlord, each becomes separate holding.

Section 85 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act contemplates ejectment only from the holding in respect of which an arrear is due. In other words, it is open to a tenant to pay up the arrear on one holding and save it from forfeiture, though he be unable to pay what is due on another holding.

A surrender by a tenant will not prejudice the rights of his mortgagee when the mortgage is not voidable at the instance of the landlord.

Mr. G. P. Dick, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Sir B. K. Bose, for Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a case where, if the facts are properly appreciated, there is little difficulty in applying the law.

The defendant-appellant, Tikaram, admits the allegations made by the plaintiff in the first nine paragraphs of the plaint. I propose, therefore, to summarise the allegations made in those paragraphs.

The plaint states that Mohanlal and Baliram were the occupancy tenants of field No. 86, area $17\frac{3}{4}$ acres, rent Rs. 26-8-0. On 3rd August 1893, that is before the coming into force of the new Tenancy Act of 1898, a thirty years' zurpeshgi lease was given to the plaintiff, of a part of the holding, namely, of 14 bighas, with rent at rupees twenty-one. It is now admitted before me that the plaintiff has failed to prove the landlord's consent to the transfer, though such consent was alleged in the plaint. The then malguzar went on accepting from the plaintiff Rs. 21 as rent out of the total rent for the holding, Rs. 26-8-0. When the new Settlement came into force the rent of the holding was enhanced to Rs. 35. The old number 86 was now numbered as Nos. 108/2, 133/1, 133/2. The portion mortgaged to the plaintiff came henceforth to be numbered 133/1. There was no distribution of the rent Rs. 35 by the Settlement Officer.

In paragraph 7 of the plaint, the plaintiff says that with the consent of the malguzar rupees thirty was fixed as the rent for No. 133/1, the plot in the possession of the mortgagee, and the plaintiff has been paying this rent accordingly.

In paragraph 6 it is stated that the rent for this plot for Sambats 1964, 1965 and 1966 was duly paid by the plaintiff to Tikaram, Musamwat Gomti and Musammat Radha, the malguzars of the village.

The plaint then refers to a partition of the village as the result of which plot

No. 133/1 has fallen to the share of Musammat Radha and Musammat Gomti.

On the 24th June 1909 Tikaram brought a suit for the rent of Nos. 133/1, 133/2 and 108/2 for Sambats 1964 and 1965 and after giving credit for Rs. 30 a year, claimed Rs. 5 a year and obtained a decree against the tenants, which was followed up by their ejectment from all the plots. These proceedings are alleged to be collusive though the defendant-appellant, Tikaram, denies it.

The plaintiff questions also Tikaram, the lambardar's right to sue alone after the partition for rents due prior to the partition.

The plaintiff asks for a declaration that the decree obtained against the tenants is not binding on him and prays for possession of No. 133/1.

Musammat Radha and Musammat Gomti (defendants Nos. 2 and 3), to whose share plot No. 133/1 has been allotted at the partition of 1909, repudiate the action of the Lambardar Tikaram. The case has been contested throughout by Tikaram alone who has no longer any interest in the plot in suit.

The first Court dismissed the suit, holding that the mortgage was without the consent of the landlord and that Tikaram, as lambardar, had authority under the Wajib-ul-arz to institute and carry on the proceedings against the tenants. On appeal the District Judge held that Tikaram had a right to carry on the ejectment proceedings. On the authority of Jena Bapu v. Ram Rao (1) the lower Appellate Court found that the landlord must be deemed to have ratified the mortgage in favour of the plaintiff, though at its inception it was voidable for want of consent. The District Judge was of opinion that the plaintiff should have been called upon to pay the balance of the rent before a suit for rent against the tenant could be instituted. He has passed a decree for possession of No. 133/1 on condition that the plaintiff deposits the amount decreed in the rent suit. The defendant No. 1 has preferred this second appeal, but there is no appeal by the plaintiff.

The lower Appellate Court's finding that the landlord has ratified the mortgage has been questioned in the first ground of appeal. It has been found by the Court below that the rent for the plot in the mortgagee's possession has been always accepted from him with full knowledge of the transfer, and that the receipts are in the mortgagee's name. I may also point out that it was at the mortgagee's request that a separate rent of rupees thirty was fixed by the landlord for plot No. 133/1. The conclusion arrived at by the District Judge is fully supported by the authority of the ruling which he cites.

I am of opinion that when the landlord agreed to distribute the rent on each parcel separately, the parent holding was split up into two holdings. The mortgagee's object in making the request was to secure an independent liability for his plot unconnected with the liability of the other plots. This was an arrangement acceptable to the landlord, for at least thirty out of thirty-five rupees would be punctually paid by a well-to-do money-lender such as the plaintiff is. The mortgagee had a number of years yet to enjoy his plot under his mortgage and was practically in the position of vendee. If a partition, made by two persons interestrd in two portions of the holding, is accepted by the landlord, each becomes a separate holding. The receipts filed in the case do not suggest any intention on the part of the landlord to preserve intact the joint liability of all the plots. The appellant's learned Counsel has shown no authority for the proposition that without the order of a Settlement Officer no holding can be split up by the landlord and tenants with mutual consent. I hold that plot No. 133/1, rent Rs. 30, is a separate holding.

It is admitted that the rent for No. 133/1 was punctually paid not only for Sambats 1964 and 1965, the two years for which the suit was brought, but also for Sambat 1966. There was, therefore, no arrear in respect of this holding. Whether there should be a separate suit for arrear of rent in respect of each holding, as held in Jagannath Prasad v. Tori (2), I am clear that section 85 of the Tenancy Act contemplates ejectment only from the holding in respect of which an arrear is due. In other words it would be open to a tenant to pay up the arrear on one holding and save it from forfeiture, though he is unable to pay what is due on another holding.

NATHA SINGH v. MANGAL.

In the suit brought by Tikaram, it was open to the tenants to have pleaded that no arrear was due in respect of No. 133/1. So long, however, as the decree stands it is binding on them. Can this be regarded as a case of forfeiture, when no forfeiture has been incurred as a matter of fact? Their consent to the decree places that decree on no higher footing than a voluntary surrender. The case of Ram Saran Das v. Ram Pergash Das (3) seems to support this view.

I have already held that the finding of the lower Appellate Court that there was a ratification of the mortgage before the institution of the rent suit, is one binding on me. We have, therefore, to consider the effect of a surrender by a tenant on the rights of his mortgagee holding a valid mortgage. Section 115 of the Transfer of Property Act, though not applicable to the case, codifies the doctrine of Common Law on the point. As held by Ismay, J. C., in Bhuray v. Lala Vishwanath (4), such a surrender will not prejudice a mortgagee when the mortgage is not voidable at the instance of the landlord. In such a case the tenancy has, in consideration of law, a continuauce.

I need not express any opinion as to whether Tikaram alone could maintain the rent suit and the subsequent ejectment proceeding.

In my opinion, the plaintiff was entitled to an unconditional decree for possession without payment of the rent due on the other plots, but no cross-objection has been filed by the plaintiff. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Custom—Adoption—Sister's son—Bajwa Jats of Nikodar Tahsil, Jullundur District—Onus.

The adoption of a sister's son or a gift to such a person is not allowed by custom of the Bajwa Jats of Jullundur district, and the onus of proving the contrary is upon the person setting up the custom.

Second appeal from the decree of the Divisional Judge, Jullundur Division, dated the 9th May 1911, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, first Class, Jullundur, dated the 23rd December 1910, decreeing the claim.

Messrs. Duni Chand and Badr-ud-Din Kureshi, for the Appellant.

Mr. Asquith, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The parties are Bajwa Jats of Nikodar Tahsil, Jullundur District. Plaintiffs, who are the collaterals in the fourth degree of one Sawan deceased sue for possession of the land left by the deceased, on the allegation that the defendant, Natha Singh, the son of Sawan's sister, took possession thereof upon his uncle's decease and had mutation effected in his name. The defendant pleaded that the land in dispute had not descended from an ancestor common to the plaintiffs and Sawan; that Sawan had adopted defendant in his infancy and brought him up as a son; and that in addition Sawan shortly before his death had made a gift of his property to defendant.

The Subordinate Judge held that the property was ancestral; that plaintiffs were related to deceased in the fourth degree; that an adoption had in fact taken place, though in all probability only shortly before the execution of the deed of adoption which was dated the 17th March 1909; that the said adoption was invalid by custom; and finally that the alleged gift in favour of defendant had not been proved. He, accordingly, granted plaintiffs the decree prayed for.

The Divisional Judge on appeal agreed with the Subordinate Judge that the gift had not been proved and that the alleged adoption, even if it took place in fact, was contrary to custom and invalid. He, accordingly (without coming to any finding as to whether the property was ancestral or whether an adoption had in fact taken place), dismissed defendant's appeal.

A further appeal has been filed by the defendant in this Court, and the main contention urged on his behalf is that there is no proof that the land in question is ancestral qua the plaintiffs and that as a result, the mere fact of his adoption would suffice to oust the plaintiffs who, in the event of the property being self-acquired, would have no locus standi to contest the validity of the adoption.

After hearing lengthy arguments, we are of opinion that plaintiffs have succeeded in showing that the land in suit originally descended from the common ancestor, Gola, who founded the village very many years ago. The statement made by the proprietors of the village in 1885 at the time of Settlement is conclusive upon this point. They then asserted that the village had been founded by their ancestor, Gola, and that the lands held by them had descended from him, though in the course of time various branches of the family had divided areas inter se. The presumption then is that this land, which was originally ancestral, has continued to bear the same character and it was for the defendant to prove that it had lost that character. He has not been able to show that it has ever passed out of the hands of the descendants of Gola, and in these circumstances we must hold that the first Court's finding is correct and that the land is ancestral.

Upon this finding it is hardly necessary for us, in face of the Full Bench ruling in Ralla v. Budha (1), to add that the onus of proving that Bajwa Jats of Jullundur District recognise the validity of the adoption of a sister's son lay very heavily upon the defendant. The instances cited by him are mostly irrelevant, and those that are in point date from a time long since past and it is impossible to obtain full details with regard to the circumstances surrounding them. In the case of Amru, for instance, he is said to have given three-fourths of his land to his daughter before the first Settlement, but we have no particulars as to whether there were any reversioners or whether they consented to the gift. The other instance relates to a case of a daughter's son and was decided so long ago as 1863. On the other hand, in addition to the Full Bench ruling cited, we have a comparatively recent decision (Civil Appeal No. 418 of 1894) by Division a Bench of this Court to the effect that the adoption of a sister's son, or a gift to such a person, is not allowed by custom of the Hindu Jats of the Jullundur District.

Upon these authorities we agree with the Courts below that the adoption, if it took place in fact, was contrary to custom and that defendant had no right to the land for which plaintiffs have brought the present suit. The appeal is consequently dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Minor—Sale by de facto guardian, validity of—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 91—Suit to set aside sale.

An alienation of the property of a minor by a person who is that minor's guardian de facto, but not de jure, is not merely voidable but absolutely void, and the minor need not sue to have it set aside before he can obtain possession of the property.

Article 91 of the Limitation Act does not apply where the sale is void.

Appeal against the decree of the Divisional Judge, Nerbudda Division, dated the 11th March 1913, confirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Nimar, dated the 15th November 1912.

Dr. H. S. Gour and Mr. S. R. Pandit, for the Appellant.

Mr. J. Mitra, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff, Rajaram, is the son of Musammat Lawangai, the younger of the two widows of his father, Nahad or Naharu. On the 25th of February 1905 his father's elder widow, Musammat Jamnai, acting on his behalf as his guardian, executed a sale-deed of his property in favour of the defendant, Husen Rangrez, for Rs. 2,000. At that time the age of Rajaram was between 13 and 17 years. One Kushal, son of Gulba, joined Musammat Jamnai in the execution of the deed of sale. He was apparently cousin to the plaintiff, but it seems to have been admitted all through the case that he had no title to the property and was not a necessary party to the transfer. The two widows and Rajaram lived together, and the elder widow, Musammat Jamnai, seems to have managed the property and the family affairs. The suit out of which this appeal arises was filed by Rajaram on the 23rd of June 1911, that is to say, within six years and four months of the execution of the sale-deed by his step mother. His own mother, Musammat Lawangai, is still alive.

Rajaram alleged in his plaint that he was then about nineteen years of age and that the sale-deed of February 1905 was void, because it was for no consideration and because neither of the executants had any right to deal with his property. He prayed, therefore, that he might be restored to possession of his property, making an offer at the same time to refund to the defendant any part of the consideration stated in the deed of sale which might be found to have been received for necessary purposes and for his benefit. He added an alternative prayer for joint possession in case it should be found that Kushal was owner of a share at the time of the transfer. It has been found in both the Courts below that Rajaram was not twenty years old when he instituted this suit and that of the consideration stated in the sale-deed it has been proved that Musammat Jamnai took and applied Rs. 1,275 for necessary purposes and the benefit of the minor. He, therefore, was given a decree for possession of the property on payment of Rs. 1,275, and this sum is now stated to have been paid into Court on or before the date fixed.

In both the Courts below it has been held that it is unnecessary to decide whether the deed is void or voidable or what Article of the second Schedule of the Limitation Act applies to the suit, because of the finding that the suit has been brought within three years of the attainment of majority by the plaintiff. Both judgment and decree of the first Court, however, ordered the deed of sale to be "dismissed" on payment of the sum found to have been taken for necessary and proper purposes, so that it was there treated as voidable. In the lower Appellate Court it was held, on the authority of the ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mata Din v. Sheikh Ahmad Ali (1), that the Article of the Schedule of the Limitation Act governing the suit is neither 44 nor 91, but 144. This is going beyond their Lordships' judgment, as they refrained from deciding whether the sale in the case before them was void or merely voidable, that is to say, whether Article 91 did or did not apply to the case. In delivering the judgment, Lord Robson said: "There has been much argument. . . . as to whether . . a sale by a de facto guardian, if made for necessity, or for the payment of an ancestral debt, affecting the minor's property, and if beneficial to the minor, is altogether void or merely voidable. It is not necessary to decide that question in this case. To begin with, the appellant has not succeeded in showing that the disputed sale of 1889, although made for the payment of an ancestral debt, was made of necessity, or was beneficial to the minor. On the contrary, the Courts below have all found on the evidence that it was unnecessary and cannot be said to have been beneficial so far as Ahmad Ali was concerned."

There is, however, a distinct indication of their Lordships' opinion on this point in the passage immediately preceding that just quoted, where they said: "It is urged on behalf of the appellant that the elder brothers were de facto guardians of the respondent, and as such were entitled to sell his property, provided that the sale was in order to pay his debts and was, therefore, necessary in his interest. It is difficult to see how the situation of an unauthorised guardian is bettered by describing him as a de facto guardian. He may, by his de facto guardianship, assume important responsibilities in relation to the minor's property, but he cannot thereby clothe himself with legal power to sell it." Later also their Lordships described the sale as "effected not by a guardian, but by a wholly unauthorised person." We have also the ruling of the Allahabad High Court in Nizam-ud-din Shah v. Anandi Prasad (2) and that of the Calcutta High Court in Moyna Bibi v. Banku Behari Biswas (3) which are directly in point. I hold, therefore, that an alienation of the property of a minor by a person who is that minor's guardian de facto but not de jure is not merely voidable but absolutely void, and the minor need not sue to have it set aside before he can obtain possession of the property.

The cases cited as opposed to this view were the rulings of this Court in Seetaram Sadasheo v. Nilu Patel (4) and Musammat Tanto v. Gajadhar (5) and of the Allahabad High Court in Ramausar Pandey v. Raghubar Jati (6) and Gajeshri Prasad v. Dharma Dat (7). In the first two cases the alienation was by the mother of the minor who was his guardian de jure and also de facto. In the third, the plaintiff alleged that the person who had alienated his property during his minority as his mother and guardian was in fact neither, and the learned Judges found in a judgment of four lines that Article 142 of the Limitation Act applied. The fourth case was one of alienation by the elder brother of a Hindu minor and in order to enable the Court to decide the question of limitation, the suit was remanded for a finding whether the elder brother was the lawful guardian of the minor or had any other legal power to convey the property or not. The first two cases are, therefore, distinguishable, and the last two support the view I have taken.

The sale to the defendant being void, Article 91 of the Limitation Act does not apply, and under Article 144, which governs the suit, it is well within time. I may say that if it had been necessary for the purposes of this appeal to uphold the findings of the Courts below in respect of the plaintiff's age as a proper finding of fact, I should have had the greatest difficulty in doing so. The question is, however, immaterial in the view I have taken. The only other plea taken in appeal was in regard to a suggested ratification by the minor after attaining majority. There cannot, of course, be any ratification of a contract which is void ab initio. In any case ratification was not pleaded in the first Court, and the only evidence now suggested as tending to show that the minor did ratify the contract is the fact that on the 12th of June 1911 he took a lease from the defendant for one year of two of the six malik-makbuza fields in dispute. The area of the six fields is 52·72 acres, and of the two leased is 16·52 acres, and there is absolutely no evidence to show that when he executed the kabulyat the plaintiff had that full knowledge of the facts which is essential to ratification or estoppel. The remaining grounds taken in the petition of appeal were expressly abandoned. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed and the appellant must pay the respondent's costs.

Execution--Application to revive execution proceedings—Limitation.

A decree for the demolition of a house was passed on 31st July 1907. On 15th of February 1909, an application was made for execution. On 26th of May 1909 the judgment-debtor put in an application asking for two weeks' time to demolish the house. The decree-holder consented to it. The Court in order to lighten its file by removal of one case from it ordered to strike off the application for execution. On 21st of July 1913 the decree-holder again made an application that steps should be taken to demolish the house:

Held, that the application of the 21st July 1913 was an application to revive the former application and the execution was not barred by time.

Second appeal from the decision of the Additional Judge of Farrukhabad, dated 9th May 1914.

Dr. S. N. Sen, for the Appellant.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The only question in this case is whether the application for execution filed by the decree-holder on the 21st July 1913 is time-barred. The decree-holder obtained a decree on the 31st of July 1907 for the demolition of a house. On the 15th of February 1909 an application for execution was made by him in which he prayed that the decree might be given effect to and the house demolished. The judgment-debtor put in an application on the 26th of May 1909 asking for two weeks' time to demolish the house; to this the decree-holder consented. The Court, however, apparently with a view to show that its file had been lightened by the removal of one case from it, passed an order striking off the application for execution. Meanwhile the brother of the judgment-debtor instituted a regular suit in respect of the house claiming it as his own. On the 18th of June 1909 the brother of the judgment-debtor applied to the Court to stay proceedings in the execution case, on the ground that he had instituted his suit. Upon this application the Court made an order to the effect that as the execution case had already been struck off the file no order of stay was necessary. After the decision of the suit brought by the judgment-debtor's brother, the decree-holder made his application on the 21st of July 1913 and prayed that steps should be taken for the demolition of the house. The judgment-debtor contended that execution was time-barred. Both the Courts below have overruled his objection and have held that the application now made by the decree-holder must be deemed to be one for the revival of the execution proceedings commenced on the 15th of February 1909. In my opinion this view is correct. In the year 1909 when the judgment-debtor took time for the purpose of demolishing the house, the Court must be deemed to have stayed proceedings when it granted the application for time. There was no occasion to reject the application for execution. The proper order of the Court ought to have been an order staying proceedings for the period for which time was taken. But as I have said above, it apparently wanted to show a clear file and, therefore, removed the case from the list of pending cases. The order passed on the 26th of May 1909 must be deemed to be an order staying proceedings until further orders and the present application can only be regarded as an application to revive and continue the proceedings which had thus been stayed. In this view no question of limitation arises and the appeal must fail. I dismiss it with costs.

KANHAYA LAL—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Suit to set aside decree passed against a person as minor on ground that he was not minor—Burden of proof.

Where a decree passed against a person as a minor is sought to be declared null and void on the ground that he was not minor but major at the date of the suit, the burden of proof lies on him to establish his allegation.

First appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Hoshangabad, dated the 19th April 1912.

Mr. S. R. Pandit, for the Appellant.

Mr. Atmaram Bhagwant, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff-appellant sues for a declaration that the decree in Suit No. 9 of 1909 in the Court of the District Judge, Hoshangabad, is null and void as against him. His allegations are that whereas at the date of the former suit he was twenty-two years of age, he was described in the plaint in that suit as a minor, and one Buddhu Singh, his brother, appointed his guardian ad litem. The plaintiff says that he had no notice of the former litigation, and only came to know of it when the property mortgaged was sold. The plaintiff's case is that he lives in the same house as Buddhu Singh, but is not joint in estate with him since the last seven years. The defendants pleaded that the plaintiff was a minor in 1909. It is unnecessary to notice the other pleas taken in the lower Court. The suit has been dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff has failed to prove that he had attained majority in 1909.

The argument for the appellant was two-fold. In the first place, he contends that he has proved the plaintiff's age in 1909 to be twenty-two. Secondly, he contends on the authority of Cheyt Narain Singh v. Bunwaree Singh (1) that it was for the defendant to establish that the plaintiff was a minor at the time of the former suit.

The plaintiff's two witnesses on the point of his age have been disbelieved by the lower Court. The defendants have adduced no evidence on this point. I agree with the learned District Judge that no reliance can be safely placed on the testimony of the plaintiff's two witnesses, and I need not repeat the reasons he has given in his judgment.

On the second point, I agree with the learned District Judge that the burden of proof lay on the plaintiff to establish the allegations made in his plaint. The case from the Weekly Reporter cited above is not in point. There the question was whether the plaintiff was a minor at the date of the suit. In this case we are concerned with the plaintiff's minority when a former suit against him was pending. Under Order XXXII, rule (3), the Court can only appoint a guardian for a defendant on being satisfied of the fact of his minority. From Exhibit P-3, a copy of the order-sheet in Suit No. 9 of 1909, I find that on the 17th April 1909 the Court held Gokal Singh (the present plaintiff) to be a minor and thereupon proceeded to appoint his elder brother Buddhu Singh as his guardian for the suit. On what materials the Court was satisfied of the plaintiff's minority, I am unable to find from the record. I think it is for the plaintiff to show that though the former Court was satisfied that he was a minor, he was really not so. The defendants may well rely on the order of the Court in the absence of satisfactory proof by the plaintiff showing that the order was erroneous. The case is somewhat analogous to a case where a defendant, against whom an ex parte decree has been passed, seeks to set aside that decree on the ground that the summons was not duly served on him. In such a case the burden will be on the defendant to prove non-service of summons, as held in Torob Ali v. Chooramun Singh Chowdhry (2). The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—In this case the plaintiff sued to recover certain lands which she alleged to form part of her mitta and to have been wrongfully taken possession of by Government, and in the alternative for a reduction of the peishkush charged on the mitta and a refund of the peishkush paid by her for Fasli 1317 proportionate to the extent of the lands which had been taken from her. The boundaries of the mitta and the adjoining Government lands were delineated under the Boundary Marks Act XXVIII of 1860, in the year 1880, when the Boundary Settlement Officer found that the lands in question had never formed part of the area of the mitta and accordingly excluded them. The proprietor of the mitta did not contest this decision by filing a suit under section 25 of the Act as he might have done. In these circumstances the decision of the Boundary Settlement Officer, that the lands in question did not form part of the zemindari, is res judicata according to the decision of the Full Bench in Kamaraju v. Secretary of State for India (1) and I think that the ground of the decision, viz., that they never had formed part of the mitta, is also res judicata as having formed the ground of decision. The Subordinate Judge was, therefore, right in dismissing the plaintiff's suit on this ground. In the view I take of the case, the question whether the Court is precluded by the terms of section 58 of the Madras Revenue Recovery Act, II of 1864, from entertaining the plaintiffs' claim for a return of proportionate peishkush for the fasli in question, as to which there was a difference of opinion between the learned Judges who heard the appeal, does not arise. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

AYLING, J.—I agree.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I entirely agree with my Lord. I only wish to say a few words with reference to the argument of Mr. Govindaraghava Aiyar that the decision of the Survey Officer in 1880 under section 24 of Act IV of 1897 is conclusive only as regards the actual decision arrived at in the case, namely, that the lands claimed belonged to the Government and not to the mittadar. I am unable to uphold this contention. Exhibit III, the petition to Mr. Baber, sets out the ground on which the claim was made. It says that prior to the sale of the mitta to the claimant's transferor, the mitta included the lands in dispute, and that at the sale in 1868, they passed to the purchaser. These were the questions which the Survey Officer had to decide. He did decide them, although he did not raise the points in the form of specific issues. Section 24 of the Boundary Marks Act says that such a decision is final, subject to its being contested in a Civil Court within a specified time. It is conceded in this case that no suit was filed within the time limited. The decision is, therefore, binding upon the parties, whether it is res judicata in the technical sense in which the term is used in the Civil Procedure Code or not. The general principles enunciated in section 11 of that Code are of universal application. The question under that section will be whether a matter was substantially in issue, and not whether it has been formally in issue. It was pointed out by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Krishna Behari Roy v. Bunwari Lal Roy (2): "It has probably never been better laid down than in a case which was referred to in Gregory v. Molesworth (3), in which Lord Hardwicke held that where a question was necessarily decided in effect, though not in express terms, between parties to the suit, they could not raise the same question as between themselves in any other suit in any other form; and that decision has been followed by a long course of decisions, the greater part of which will be found noticed in the very able notes of Mr. Smith to the case of the Duchess of Kingston." In Narayanan Chetty v. Kannammai Achi (4) the learned Judges say that an appellate judgment operates by way of estoppel as regards all findings which are necessary to make the decree effective. Gokul v. Shrimal (5) lays down the same proposition. Apart from the plea of res judicata, as a question of estoppel the same considerations must apply. In Bigelow on Estoppel, after a full examination of all the English and American authorities, it is stated: "A former judgment or verdict, on the other hand, is conclusive between the parties to contested causes (as has already been intimated) of all necessary inferences arising from it as well as of the matters actually in issue." See also pages 97 and 157. Sir George Mellish expresses the proposition thus in Alison's case, In re Bank of Hindustan, China and Japan (6): "It is clear, I apprehend, that the judgment of the Courts of Common Law is not only conclusive with reference to the actual matter decided, but that it is also conclusive with reference to the grounds of the decision, provided that from the judgment itself the actual grounds of the decision can be clearly discovered." It seems clear from the authorities that the plea of res judicata or estoppel is available not only as regards the final conclusion of the Court or Officer, but also regarding all findings necessary for arriving at that conclusion, whether they are given on formal issues raised in the case or are referable to the points which must have been the basis of the final determination. In the present case, the principal subject of controversy was whether the Court sale of the mitta included the lands which the Government claimed to exclude. It was on the ground that it did not form a portion of the mitta that the Survey Officer decided that the property did not belong to the claimant but to the Government. That pronouncement estops the appellant from claiming that the lands in dispute passed to him by the auction-sale. As the peishkush was imposed only after the sale to him, it follows that the assessment on these lands was not taken into account in fixing the amount payable by the appellant.

NAGPUR JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

CIVIL REVISION APPLICATION No. 175 OF 1913.

March 26, 1914.

Present:—Mr. Stanyon, A. J. C.

MADHGIA—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 12—Time requisite for obtaining copies, computation of—Due diligence—Application through agent—Agent's delay—Risk—Extension of time—Tender of copying fee on public holiday, whether proper.

The time requisite for obtaining copies must be measured from the date when an application for such copies is duly presented by, and the date on which such copies are duly tendered for delivery to, the applicant.

The time requisite for obtaining a copy is the time which it takes an applicant to obtain the copy using all due diligence. He must (1) present an application, accompanied by the prescribed fee, at a proper time and place to the appointed official; and (2) be prepared to take delivery of the copies at the time and place fixed for delivery. If he does not discharge both these duties he fails to exercise the due diligence required to obtain the copies. But he may do these acts personally or by an agent.

Where, however, he elects to work throught an agent, he cannot claim credit for any delay caused by taking that course. The time allowed for obtaining copies through an agent is the same as would have been allowed if the applicant had himself applied for and taken delivery of them, irrespective of the question whether the agent's delay was or was not beyond the control of the principal. A principal who elects to use an agent in working against strict rules of time does so at his own risk.

The computation of time for obtaining copies of judicial records is subject to strict rules and no discretionary extensions of such time are permissible.

A suit was dismissed on the 30th November 1912. On the 14th December 1912 the plaintiff posted an application for copies of judgment and decree, and on the same day despatched a money order to pay the cost thereof. The application reached the hands of the Clerk of the Court on the 16th December 1912, but the money order which reached the delivery Post Office on the 18th December could not be delivered to the Clerk of the Court before the 21st December, because the 18th, 19th and 20th December being public holidays, the copying office was closed during those days. The copies were ready and were posted to the applicant on the 20th January 1913:

Held, in computing the period of limitation for an appeal against the decree, that

(1) the application for copies was not presented until the 21st December 1912;

(2) the Post Office being an agent of the applicant, the time to which the applicant was entitled should be measured from the date when the Post Office delivered the application and the necessary money to the official appointed to receive the same, and the day on which the official appointed to deliver the copies made such delivery to the Post Office;

(3) all time occupied by the Post Office in conveying the application and fees to the copying office, and in carrying back the copies to the applicant, was outside that computation;

(4) the tender of fees transmitted by money order on a public holiday was not a tender at the proper time.

Civil revision against the decree of the District Judge, Bhandara, dated the 30th April 1913.

Mr. A. M. Moodlyar, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are not disputed. The plaintiff sued the defendants for Rs. 172-13-0 in the Court of the Munsif of Sakoli, and the suit was dismissed on the 30th November 1912. On the 14th December 1912 the plaintiff posted an application for copies of the judgment and decree, and on the same day despatched a money order to pay the costs thereof. The application reached the hands of the Clerk of Court on the 16th December 1912. The money order is said to have reached the delivery post office on the 18th December, but the 18th, 19th and 20th December being holidays during which the copying office was closed, payment of the money order was made to the Clerk of Court on the 21st December 1912. The copies were ready and were posted to the applicant on the 20th January 1913, and he filed an appeal from the Munsif's decree on the 31st January 1913 in the Court of the District Judge. That Court, allowing from the 21st December 1912 to the 20th January 1913 as time requisite for obtaining "copies," found the appeal to have been filed one day too late and dismissed it as time-barred. The plaintiff has, therefore, made the present application for revision.

I will assume for the sake of argument that the decision of this Court in Duri v. Mohanlal (1) does not stand in the way of my consideration of the present application on the merits thereof. Circular No. V—8 of this Court contains the rules regulating the grant of copies of Civil judicial records. Rule 3 thereof reads :—

"Every application shall be accompanied by an advance sufficient to cover the estimated cost of the copy applied for. In the case of an application sent by post the advance shall be remitted by money order. An application unaccompanied by an advance shall not be registered or acted on."

This rule follows the general principle laid down in section 6 of the Court Fees Act, 1870, and no application for copies can be taken to have been duly presented unless and until the prescribed advance which should be tendered with it has been received. Therefore, I concur with the learned District Judge in holding that the application for copies in this case was not presented until the 21st December 1912.

Two circumstances are, however, urged in support of the applicant's contention that due presentation should be taken to have been made on an earlier date. Firstly, it is said that the application and the money order having been despatched by the applicant on the same day, the 14th December 1912, the failure of the money order to reach the Clerk of Court on the 16th December, when the application was put into his hand, was a result beyond the control of the applicant and should not be debited to him. On this ground it is claimed that the money order should be deemed to have been delivered on the date when in ordinary course it should have been delivered, and due presentation of the application should be held to have been made on the 16th December 1912. Secondly, it is said that the money payable under the order was in fact tendered by the Post Office to the Clerk of Court on the 18th December 1912, but was not received owing to the Court and its offices being closed on that day—one of the three public holidays already mentioned. On this ground it is claimed that presentation of the application for copies became complete on the 18th December 1912.

I am of opinion that neither of these contentions can be accepted. A study of the case-law on the subject seems to me to show that the time requisite for obtaining copies must be measured from the date when an application for such copies is duly presented by, and the date on which such copies are duly tendered for delivery to, the applicant. The authorities I have considered are Upasoo v. Gopala (2); Musammat Kaveri Bai v. Musammat Chandra Bhagabai (3); Punjaji v. Jagannath (4); Garud v. Hira Ram (5); Parashram v. Likhan (6); Krishna v. Balia (7); Paga v. Sadasheo (8); Bechi v. Ahsan-ullah Khan (9); Yamaji v. Antaji (10); Nobin Chunder Roy v. Brojendro

Coomar Roy (11), and my own unreported judgment in Pandurang v. Balaji (12), decided on the 7th November 1911. The view laid down in Punjaji v. Jagannath (4), that the time requisite for obtaining a copy is the time which it takes an applicant to obtain the copy using all due diligence, was approved in Krishna v. Balia (7): and I concur in it. In order to obtain copies of a Civil Court judgment and decree the applicant must perform two acts, namely—

(1) he must present an application accompanied by the prescribed fees at a proper time and place to the appointed official; and

(2) he must be prepared to take delivery of the copies at the time and place fixed for delivery.

Unless the applicant discharges both these duties, he fails to exercise the due diligence required to obtain the copies. But he may do these acts personally or by an agent duly empowered. Where, however, he elects to work through an agent, he cannot claim credit for any delay caused by taking that course. He cannot include, as time requisite for obtaining the copies, any period occupied in sending his application or instructions to the agent, or by the agent in proceeding to the copying office and presenting the application, or in the transmission of the copies by the agent to him. In other words, the time allowed for copies obtained through an agent will be the same as would have been allowed if the principal had himself applied for and taken delivery of them, namely, from the date when the application is duly presented to the date when the copies are duly tendered for delivery: and this will be so irrespective of the question whether or not the agent's delay was or was not beyond the control of the principal. A principal who elects to use an agent in working against strict rules of time does so at his risk. The computation of time is subject to strict rules, and must not be confused with cases where for sufficient cause an extension of time is allowable. There is no rule for discretionary extensions of time in computing the time requisite for obtaining copies of judicial records. This was pointed out in the Allahabad case above quoted.

One of the agents whom an applicant for such copies may employ is the Post Office: and the time which he will be entitled to in such a case will be measured from the date when the Post Office has delivered the application and the necessary money to the official appointed to receive the same, and the day on which the official appointed to deliver the copies makes such delivery to the Post Office. All time occupied by the Post Office in conveying the application and fees to the copying office, and in carrying back the copies to the applicant, is outside that computation. I took this view in Pandurang v. Balaji (12), and I see no reason to modify it in any way. Abnormal and unexpected failures of the Post Office, like such failures on the part of any other agent—failures for which the applicant is in no way responsible—may be sufficient ground for extending time in cases where time may be extended; but they cannot affect the computation of time.

In the present case the application was not duly presented until the advance-fees were paid in by the Post Office It is notorious that a money order takes a longer time than a plain unregistered letter to reach the addressee, and there is no ground for assuming that there was anything unusual in the money order not being paid on the 16th December 1912: while any tender of the fees transmitted by the money order on a public holiday was not a tender at the proper time for the purpose of payment under the rule above cited.

For these reasons I hold that the District Court rightly held the applicant's appeal to have been filed one day beyond time. The exercise of its discretion in not extending time is not open to consideration in revision. This application is, therefore, dismissed without notice to the other side.

Application dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—It will be convenient in the first place to state briefly the facts which have given rise to this litigation. Messrs. Arbuthnot & Co., hereinafter referred to as the firm, carried on business for a great many years in Madras as Bankers and General Merchants until they were adjudicated insolvents on their own petition in October 1906. The firm for many years had an agency at Bimilipatam, and according to the usual method of business made their purchases from local traders there through Dubashes, who guaranteed the transactions for a commission and gave security for the guarantee. The defendants' family had been the firm's Dubashes at Bimilipatam for many years and so continued until the failure. Purchases were made through them of other produce besides jute, such as indigo and gingelly seeds, but of late years nearly all the purchases were of jute to be used in the Jute Mill at Chittivalasa.

The conditions of business between the firm and the Dubashes were governed by written agreements, which were renewed from time to time in consequence of changes in the Dubashes' family, see Exhibit II, dated 23rd February 1903, and Exhibit I, dated 11th March 1905, which was in force at the date of the failure. Under these agreements the Dubashes were prohibited from transacting business as agents or Dubashes for any other firm except Arbuthnot & Co. They were to guarantee delivery of all goods contracted for through them and pay 12½ per cent. of the value of the goods as liquidated damages for non-delivery; they were also to guarantee the re-payment of advances made by the firm to themselves or through them to local dealers, advances which are incidental to the sort of business. As security for the due performance of the terms and the conditions of the agreement and for the due performance of all present and future transactions between the Dubashes and the firm, "including the purchase by the Dubashes of gunny bags or other merchandise," it was recited that the Dubashes had deposited fifty-thousand rupees with the firm which was to carry interest at Rs. 5 per cent.; in other words, the defendants were to keep Rs. 50,000 on fixed deposit in the firm's Bank as security for the liabilities they might incur as the firm's Dubashes. In the last clause it was provided that the agreement was intended to operate as an agreement between the Dubashes and the firm of Arbuthnot & Co., whether it should continue as then constituted, or consists of other persons. The special provision that the security should be for the due performance of all transactions including the purchase of gunny bags or other merchandise, shows clearly that it was intended that business connected with the Chittivalasa Mill was to be done under this agreement. One of these agreements between the firm and the Dubashes, Exhibit II, was entered into after the Chittivalasa Mill had been transferred to a limited Company, the Chittivalasa Spinning and Weaving Company, Limited, owned by the firm, and the other, Exhibit I, after that Company had sold the mill to the present plaintiff's Company, brought into existence in October 1906 to take over the industrial undertakings carried on by the firm. The firm were the Managing Agents of both these Companies and it may be added, though t is not perhaps very material, that the firm had a very large interest in the industrials, as may be gathered from the order made by the Insolvency Court, Exhibit 16*a*, and also from the allusion in the plaintiff's evidence to the sale of the industrials by the Official Assignee.

In the present suit the plaintiff Company sues as principals to recover from the defendants, the firm's Dubashes, the amount of the defendants' indebtedness at the date of the firm's failure on contracts entered into with the firm in respect of the Chittivalasa Mill which contracts, it is alleged, were made by the firm as agents of the plaintiff Company. The main defences raised were that the defendants had never contracted with the plaintiff Company; that they were unaware before the failure that the firm in these transactions were acting for the plaintiff Company and were entitled to set off against the plaintiff's claim the greater sum of Rs. 50,000 deposited by them with the firm under Exhibit I; and that in any event, in the circumstances of the case the plaintiff Company should not be allowed to sue the defendants without giving credit for Rs. 50,000 which the defendants had deposited with the firm as security for the performance of these as well as other transactions with the firm. The Subordinate Judge in a very lengthy judgment has upheld the last contention and has dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

It may be said at once that the defendants' contention that they did not know the firm were acting as agents of the plaintiff Company in the suit transactions until after the failure in October 1906, is demonstrably false and is so found by the Subordinate Judge. The defendants from their intimate acquaintance with the affairs of the mill must have known of its transfer to the Chittivalasa Spinning and Weaving Company, and also of its subsequent transfer by the latter to the plaintiff Company; and their correspondence with the plaintiff Company and the firm soon after the plaintiff Company came into existence, Exhibit L series. proves conclusively that they did. The plaintiff Company which was registered in January 1905 was to take over from 1st October 1904. The defendants were responsible for short deliveries on that year's contracts and applied to the firm that they might be allowed to complete these deliveries in the coming year, Exhibit L2, dated 26th January 1905. From Exhibit L, dated 10th February 1905, a letter from the firm's Bimilipatam Agent to the firm as Managing Agents of Arbuthnot's Industrials, Madras, it may be gathered that the firm had passed on Exhibit L2 to themselves as Managing Agents of the Industrials and that as Managing Agents of the Industrials they sent a reply addressed to the defendants, dated the 3rd February, which was handed to them by the firm's Bimilipatam Agent. It is significant that the defendants do not produce this letter of the 3rd from the Industrials to themselves, but we have their answer to it, Exhibit L, dated 10th February 1905, addressed, "The Managing Agents, Arbuthnot's Industrials, Ltd.," in which they thank the Industrials for allowing them to deliver in next November and December "the unfulfilled portion of contracts of jute of the present crops." This is the clearest proof that they knew that the firm was acting in these jute transactions as the Agents of the Industrials and indeed, as already observed, they could not have been unaware of it.

Nonetheless all along down to the date of the firm's failure the contracts with the defendants for the sale and purchase of jute and advances were made in the name of the firm, and the defendants' account appears in the account books of the firm, and with the exception of Exhibit L, the defendants are not shown to have directly corresponded with the firm, though the correspondence between the firm and the Industrials goes to show that communications may have passed verbally through the firm's agent at Bimilipatam.

The appellants' case was that in these transactions the firm acted as Agents for the plaintiff Company to the knowledge of the defendants, and were, therefore, disentitled to avail themselves of the defence of set-off or any other equitable defence under section 232 of the Contract Act. This of course assumes that in these transactions with the defendants the firm were acting as agents for the plaintiff Company and not as principals.

Assuming that the firm are to be considered as having acted as agents for the plaintiffs in their dealings with the defendants, which seems to have been the view taken in the lower Court, still having entered into these contracts in writing in their own name, and without mentioning their agency, they could sue and be sued upon by them because, as ruled in Higgins v. Senior (1), to hold otherwise would be to vary the terms of the written contract.

Secondly, it seems clear that in such a suit on these contracts by the firm against defendants, the defendants would have been entitled to rely on the Rs. 50,000 deposited by them with the firm as bankers to secure their performance of these and other contracts with the firm, as the amount of the deposit is largely in excess of the sum sued for and there are no other claims against it on the part of the firm. Where the agent enters into a written contract in his own name, there is a contract enabling him to sue and be sued on it within the meaning of section 230 of the Indian Contract Act.

Nonetheless, of course, the plaintiff Company as principals would ordinarily be entitled under section 226 to sue on contracts entered into by the firm as their agents in the same way as if the contracts had been entered into by the plaintiff Company itself, and if the defendants neither knew nor had reasonable ground for suspecting that in the contracts sued on the firm had been acting as agents, the plaintiff Company could only have succeeded subject to the rights and obligations subsisting between the firm and the defendants, and in the circumstances of the case the latter would, in my opinion, have been entitled to set up their claim to the Rs. 50,000 by way of equitable set-off.

But, as already stated, it is clearly proved that the defendants well knew of the relations between the firm and the plaintiff Company and if so, they (defendants) are not entitled to rely on such a defence. The Subordinate Judge has held, I think rightly, with reference to this section that the defendants are not entitled to set off their claim against the firm, the agent, but has held further that the deposit of Rs. 50,000 by the defendants with the firm as security for the performance of this and other contracts with the firm creates an equity in favour of the defendants which justifies the dismissal of the suit. That would be so, if section 232 applied, but, as I have held, it has no application, seeing that the defendants knew of the relations between the firm and the plaintiff Company and in these circumstances, it seems to me that the defendants are not entitled in a suit by the plaintiff Company as principals to rely on any defence resting on "the rights and obligations subsisting between the firm (the agent) and the defendants, whether the defence be set-off or any other equity."

For these reasons I am unable to uphold the action of the Subordinate Judge in dismissing the suit on the ground of an equity subsisting between the plaintiff's agents, that is to say, the firm and the defendants.

Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar has, however, contended that in this case the plaintiff Company have no right to sue at all, as the transactions which gave rise to the suit were intended to be exclusively between the plaintiff and the defendants. Such a defence would undoubtedly be available, if proved, in English Law. In Story on Agency, Article 413, it is observed: "Another exception is where an exclusive credit is given to and by the agent; and, therefore, the principal cannot be treated as in any way a party to the contract, although he may have authorised it or may be entitled to the benefit of it." And in Montgomerie v. United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association (2) Wright, J., laid down and applied the same rule, "In all cases the parties can, by their express contract, provide that the agent shall be the person liable either concurrently with or to the exclusion of the principal, or that the agent shall be the party to sue either concurrently with or to the exclusion of the principal." See also United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association v. Neville (3) and Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Leslie (4).

Under the Indian Contract Act the principal's right to enforce a contract entered into by his agent rests on section 226, which does not contain the words "in the absence of a contract to the contrary" which are to be found in section 230, negativing the agent's right to sue and be sued in the absence of a contract to the contrary. Even so, I am not prepared to hold that a principal might not contract himself out of his right to sue on the contract under section 226 on the principle quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto, there being no provision against contracting out. It would, of course, be necessary to prove such an agreement unless the relation of the defendants to the firm was that of sub-agents, in which case there would clearly be no privity between the plaintiff Company and the defendants. See section 192 of the Indian Contract Act.

Putting aside the question of sub-agency for the moment, I think the evidence on record is sufficient to prove an agreement, disentitling the plaintiffs to sue, of the kind referred to in Mr. Bowstead's Digest of the Law of Agency, Article 90.

It is admitted by Mr. O. Hearen, the plaintiff's only witness, and abundantly proved by the documents exhibited that business between the firm and the Dubashes went on in exactly the same form after the creation of the Chittivalasa and Industrial Companies as before. The suit contracts for the purchase of jute, A series, and the sale of gunnies, E series, were in terms between the defendants and the firm. K series are delivery orders of gunny bags to the defendants by the firm's agents. According to the evidence of witnesses the firm's agent was not asked to change the mode of correspondence or make any change in the modes of dealing after the Industrials were opened. Exhibits IV and VI series are contract orders between the firm's agent and the defendants. Exhibit V, dated 10th January 1903, during the time of the Chittivalasa Company is from the firm's agent to the defendants "enclosing your jute account with Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co." Exhibit VIII, dated 23rd July 1906, is from the firm's agent to the defendants enclosing a memo. of gunnies purchased for them and of their commission, as to which reference is made to the firm's letter dated 7th December 1894. Exhibit IX are orders for gunnies between the firm's agent and the defendants. X series are the gunny contracts and XI series the receipts by the firm's agent for the price of the gunnies and XII series are delivery orders issued by the firm's agent to the defendants.

Formerly, therefore, the suit contracts, the accounts and the correspondence were all along between the firm and the defendants and the formation of the Chittivalasa and the plaintiff Companies made no difference at all.

Then as to matters of substance, it is perfectly clear that the suit contracts were intended to come under the provisions of the agreement between the firm and the defendants, Exhibit I, which was entered into in renewal of former contracts at a time when the plaintiff Company had come into existence just as the earlier agreement in the same terms. Exhibit II was entered into between the same parties in the time of the Chittivalasa Spinning and Weaving Company.

Secondly, it is clear that these agreements, Exhibits I and II, were entered into by the firm as principals because they cover other business of the firm with which the plaintiff Company was not concerned. These contracts expressly stipulate at the outset that the defendants were not to transact business either as agents for, or Dubashes of, any individual or firm other than the firm of Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co., and of this the plaintiff Company were aware as Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co. were their Managing Agents. Further in all the documents the defendants are addressed as Arbuthnot and Co.'s Dubashes.

On the above facts it seems to me that the reasonable inference is that the suit dealings of the Dubashes were intended to be with their firm exclusively in accordance with Exhibit I, and I may further refer to Exhibit IV filed by the plaintiffs, dated 24th May 1905, in which the defendants say that "they were tied hand and foot and prevented from having any sort of dealing with any other firm." I do not think the fact proved by Exhibit L series that the defendants knew the firm were the agents of the plaintiff Company and that in one instance, Exhibit L1, they answered a letter addressed to them by the plaintiff Company and the fact that terms of the contracts were settled in correspondence between the firm's Agent at Bimilipatam and the plaintiff Company (Exhibit J series), even if brought home to the defendants, are sufficient evidence to show that they intended to depart from the terms of Exhibit I and deal with any one but the firm of Arbuthnot and Co.

It seems to me, however, that the right view of the case on the above facts is that the defendants were the sub-agents of the firm of Arbuthnot & Co. who were the agents of the plaintiff Company and that under section 192 of the Indian Contract Act and the decisions there was no privity between the plaintiff Company and the defendants and that on this ground the present suit should have been dismissed. In all these transactions the defendants acted and were addressed as Messrs. Arbuthnot & Co.'s Dubashes, that is to say, as intermediaries between the firm and local dealers and guarantors of the firm's transactions.

The position of Dubashes in this part of India is much the same as that of Banians in Northern India, which was considered in Peacock v. Baijnath (5) by Wilson and Cunningham, JJ., in a passage of their judgment at page 586, which was subsequently approved by the Privy Council on appeal.

The observations of Sir Lawrence Peel in Archibald Orr Ewing and William Miller v. Govinchunder Sein (6), that a Banian is a sub-agent of a peculiar kind, was quoted with approval and the learned Judges observed: "This case is really much stronger than the many cases in England, in which it has been held that no privity existed between foreign principals and English sub-agents, such as the New Zealand and Australian Land Company v. Watson (7) and Kaltenback v. Lewis (8), because the Banian is in the permanent employment of the Calcutta firm." Here it may be added that such employment of the defendants by the firm was not only permanent but conclusive.

The conclusion I have come to is that the defendants acted as the sub-agents of Arbuthot & Co., who were the Managing Agents of the plaintiff Company that there was no privity between the plaintiff and the defendants and that both on this ground and on the ground already stated the present suit fails,—and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

The memorandum of objections is dismissed.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I entirely agree with the conclusion at which the learned Chief Justice has arrived. As the questions involved are of some importance, I shall state my own reasons for the conclusion.

The late firm of Arbuthnot & Co. had a gunny factory at Chittivalasa. They had also a spinning and weaving mill there. The defendants and their father were the agents and Dubashes of the company since 1890. A sum of Rs. 50,000 was deposited by them with the Company in fixed deposit as security for the due performance of their duties as agents and Dubashes. This deposit was being renewed from time to time. It remained with the Company until their insolvency in 1906. These facts are not disputed.

In January 1905, Arbuthnot & Co. converted the business in Chittivalasa into a limited Company known as Arbuthnot's Industrials. Plaintiffs are the successors-in-title of this new Company. It is in evidence that this new Company was worked by Arbuthnot & Co. as Managing Agents. I do not think that this fact admits of any doubt. I am also satisfied that the defendants were aware of the starting of the Industrials. Exhibits L and L1 are clear on this point. I do not think, however, these documents establish that the defendants undertook to transact their business in future with the new Company. It is true that they received a letter from the Industrials informing them of the extension of time for performance of their contract, and they addressed their reply to them; but I am not satisfied that this communication fixes them with an undertaking to deal thenceforward with the new Company. In the view that I have taken of the subsequent contract, this may not be material; but I think it right to state my conclusion upon the contention raised by Mr. Richmond that it is proved by Exhibit L1 that the defendants accepted the plaintiff's predecessors-in-title in the place of Arbuthnot & Co.

Exhibit L1 was in February 1905. On the 11th of March 1905, Arbuthnot & Co. entered into a new agreement with the defendants (Exhibit I). The object of this agreement was much commented upon at the Bar on both sides and as my decision rests to a great extent upon the view I take of it, I shall deal with it in some detail. Mr. Richmond says that this agreement was not entered into by Arbuthnot & Co. as Managing Agents of the Industrials. I think he is right. At the same time, I feel no doubt that it was under this agreement that jute was supplied by the defendants and that gunny bags were purchased by them. Paragraph 2 of the agreement refers to "the due delivery of all goods contracted for." This includes contracts for the supply of jute. It is not pretended that the defendants contracted to deliver jute to Arbuthnot & Co. prior to the formation of the Industrials under any other contract. The previous contracts renewed by Exhibit I contained the same terms. There is no force in the contention of the learned Counsel for the appellant that the contract to supply jute was de hors this instrument. Clause 7 of Exhibit I refers to the purchase of gunny bags. Clause 8 provides for the deficit due from the defendants being met from the security amount. Thus it is clear that after the floating of the Industrials and after Exhibit L1, defendants contracted with Arbuthnot & Co., not as agents of the Industrials, but admittedly as principals to supply jute to them, to purchase gunny bags from them and to the deposit of Rs. 50,000 being held as security for the due performance of these contracts. It is not alleged or proved that these defendants supplied to Arbuthnot & Co. any jute or purchased bags other than those relating to the subject-matter of this suit. Prima facie, therefore, the plaint transactions were with Arbuthnot & Co. as principals. One very good reason why Arbuthnot & Co. dealt with the defendants in their own name is, otherwise they would have had to refund the deposit amount.

It has been argued that the contracts sued for were under Exhibits A and E series which have no reference to Exhibit I,

The language of these Exhibits A and E series contracts does not help the appellant. They are entered into by the defendants as Dubashes and agents of Arbuthnot & Co. with Arbuthnot & Co., without indicating that the latter were agents for others. It is conceded that the defendants were not the Dubashes of the Industrials at any time; but it is said that the defendants knew that Arbuthnot & Co., were the Managing Agents of the Industrials, and that the evidence establishes that it is only as such agents they entered into the contracts with the defendants.

Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar objects to the admission of this parol evidence. He relies upon section 92 of the Evidence Act and quotes an obiter dictum of Wilson, J., in Soobromonian Shetty v. Heilgers (9) in support of his position. As pointed out in Venkatasubbiah Chetty v. Govindarajulu Naidu(10), the question whether one of the contracting parties was acting for himself on behalf of a principal does not relate to the terms of the contract. Bateman v. Phillps (11) is a direct authority in favour of the admissibility of parol evidence under such circumstances. See also Bowstead on Agency, Article 90, and the cases quoted under it. But there can be no doubt that prima facie a contract by a person in his own name without more is a contract by him as principal. The authorities quoted by Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar fully bear out this proposition [Vide Dutton v. Marsh (12)]. The case of Parker v. Winlow (13) is an extreme case. Even though the principal was disclosed, the personal liability of the agent was upheld on the ground that he did not sign as agent. There is nothing in section 230 of the Indian Contract Act which marks a departure from the rule of English Law, as contended for by Mr. Richmond. That section is not exhaustive of the rules of evidence. There is no authority for the position that only in the cases mentioned in the section, presumption as to the nature of the liability of the contracting party arises. In the case before us the principal's name is not disclosed and the person signs for himself. The presumption is, therefore, strong that the contract was with Arbuthnot & Co. as principals.

Mr. Richmond relies upon Exhibit J series to rebut this presumption. It appears from these documents that Arbuthnot & Co. debited the Industrials with the advances made to the defendants under the contracts. These adjustments have not been shown to have been done with the knowledge and consent of the defendants. On the other hand, this correspondence (Exhibit J series) reads as if the contracting party was still Arbuthnot & Co. and that they were transferring the purchases and sales made by them to the account of the Industrials. There is no satisfactory evidence that the defendants were aware of the correspondence contained in Exhibit J series. The fact that large sums of money were advanced to the defendants shows that it was on the strength of the security lodged by them as Dubashes that it was done. As practically no other business was done by the defendants with Arbuthnot & Co., if the intention was to enable the Industrials to start business with the defendants on a new footing the deposit would have been returned or transferred to the new Company. Neither of these things was done and I have no hesitation in holding that the defendants did contract, and believed they were contracting only with Arbuthnot & Co. in supplying jute and in purchasing the gunny bags. This position is rendered clearer still by a reference to Exhibit VIII. That document shows that for the Exhibit A series contracts, the defendants received a commission of one per cent. as Dubashes. Under Exhibit A series, there is no right to any commission; and it was admitted that there was no separate agreement for any commission with the Industrials. As I said before, the defendants were never the Dubashes of the Industrials. It is clear to my mind from these facts that the defendants transacted the plaint business only with Arbuthnot & Co. as their Dubashes. It was argued that as the jute was to be supplied at Chittivalasa and the gunny bags were to be taken from there, it fixed the defendants with the knowledge that the contract was with the new Company. I do not see any force in this. These articles were sold and purchased even before the floating of the Industrials at Chittivalasa and the place of performance of the contracts continued to be the same.

Mr. O. Hearen, who gave evidence as plaintiff's first witness, makes admissions which show that there was absolutely no change in the mode of transacting business at Chittivalasa in consequence of the formation of the Industrials. That is what he says :—

"I do not remember whether any change was made in the modes of dealing after that spinning and weaving Company was formed. We were not asked to change the mode of correspondence or make any change in the modes of our dealings after the Industrials were floated. We received intimation to change the mode of accounts, I have not produced that intimation paper in Court. Separate accounts in the name of the Industrials were opened. It is that account book. In Exhibit II there is nothing to show that it was opened or kept in the names of the Industrials. I see the book shown to me (Exhibit III). There is no separate khata in it opened in the name of Arbuthnot Industrials prior to the insolvency of Arbuthnot & Co. Exhibit III is the account book of Industrials itself. There was no change in the mode of correspondence between Arbuthnot and Co. and the defendants after the Industrials was floated. This is a letter sent by the agent Mr. Greenfield to the defendants (Exhibit VIII). The same commission was being allowed to the defendants all through from 1894. The system of advances of moneys under contracts for jute has been enforced all through, both prior and subsequent to the floatation of the Industrials. These are the letters that passed between the agent of Arbuthnot & Co. and the defendants (Exhibit IX series). There was no change in the mode of correspondence. These are the gunny contracts (Exhibit X). They were in the same form all through. These are the receipts granted by the agent for the value of the gunnies received from the defendants (Exhibit XI series). The receipts were in the same form all through."

My conclusions on the facts are: (a) that the business of Arbuthnot & Co. in Chittivalasa was transferred to the Industrials in 1905; (b) that the defendants were aware of this (c) that even after this Arbuthnot & Co. continued their dealings with the defendants as principals and not as agents of the Industrials; (d) that the defendants had no reason to believe that Arbuthnots were acting in the sale and purchase of jute and gunny bags only as agents of the Industrials and not for themselves; and (e) the appropriation by the plaintiff's Company of the jute supplied by the defendants and debiting them with the price of the bags purchased must have been in pursuance of an understanding between Arbuthnot and Co. and the plaintiffs of which the defendants had no knowledge. I am inclined to think that Arbuthnot & Co., never severed the relationship subsisting between themselves and the defendants and that the plaintiffs were aware of this.

On these findings of fact, it follows that as the plaintiffs knew that the defendants and Arbuthnot & Co., were independent contracting parties, they can have no right of action. Even granting that the plaintiffs were not aware that Arbuthnot & Co. were dealing with the defendants in their own interests, the Industrials cannot put themselves in a more favourable position than their Managing Agents. The principle of section 231 of the Contract Act is this,—as against the agent transacting business in his own name, the principal can claim the full benefit of the contract; as against the party contracting with the agent, the principal is bound by the equities subsisting between the agent and the contracting party. Even as against the agent, it has been rightly remarked that the principal must take the benefit with the burden. He cannot both approbate and reprobate with reference to the ordinary incidents arising out of the contract. [See Joachimson v. Meghji Valji (14).] In claiming the benefit of a contract from a stranger the principle applies with greater force. The principal, if he wants to enforce the contract, must stand in the shoes of the agent and practically sue sub modo. The observations of Lord Campbell (the Lord Chancellor) in Bristow v. Whitmore (15) apply to this case. His Lordship (Lord Cranworth) said: "The principle which must, I think, govern this case is one of universal application, namely, that where a contract has been entered into by one man as agent for another, the person on whose behalf it has been made cannot take the benefit of it without bearing its burthens. The contract must be performed in its integrity. Here the appellant, as agent for the owner now represented by the respondents, stipulated for certain benefits in consideration of certain burthens which he undertook to bear, and certain labours which he undertook to perform. If he had authority to enter into such a contract the principal is, of course, bound. If he had not authority, then the principal may repudiate the contract; but he cannot take that part of it which is beneficial to him without performing that which is onerous." Wright, J., in Montgomerie v. United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association (2) points out that "where the principal is an undisclosed principal, he must, if he sues, accept the facts as he finds them at the date of his disclosure, so far as those facts are consistent with reasonable and proper conduct on the part of the other party." The decision of the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Dixon; In re Henley (16) shows that if the third party had no reason to believe that the agent was not transacting business in his own name, the principal is bound by the obligations he had subjected himself to in the course of the transaction. The same principle was laid down in Borries v. Imperial Ottoman Bank (17) accepting as well-established the dictum of Willis, J., in Semenza v. Brinsley (18) to the effect: "In order to constitute a valid defence within the rule in George v. Clagett (19), the plea should show that the contract was made by a person whom the plaintiff has intrusted with the possession of the goods, that the person sold them as his own goods in his own name as principal with the authority of the plaintiff, that the defendant dealt with him as and believed him to be the principal in the transaction, and that before the defendant was undecieved in that respect the set-off accrued." The facts I have found bring this case within the above rule.

In the Cyclopædia of Law and Procedure, Volume XXXI, page 1598, the proposition is thus succinctly stated: "And where a principal accepts a contract made by the Agent, he takes it as the agent made it, and subject to all equities and defences arising out of the conditions thereof, and the means and instrumentalities by which the agent procured it, even though the agent acted withoutauthority or in excess of his powers." See also Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume I, section 447. In the present case it is admitted that the amount of the plaintiffs' claim can be met fully from the money deposited in Arbuthnot & Co.; consequently plaintiffs are not entitled to any decree against the defendants.

For all these reasons, I am of opinion that the suit fails. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

NAGPUR JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

CIVIL MISCELLANEOUS APPEAL No. 13 OF 1913.

October 20, 1913.

Present:—Mr. Mittra, Offg. A. J. C.

Musammat MANJULA—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

SHANKAR—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

*Parties—Defendant—Living person sued but dead person entered as defendant by mistake—Summons rightly served on living defendant—*Ex parte decree passed—Decree whether ultra vires as passed against a deceased defendant.

A widow was sued on a bond executed by her husband. But in the plaint instead of her name the name of her husband's another wife, who had predeceased him, was wrongly entered as the defendant in the case. However, she accepted the summons as a good summons and on her failure to appear on the date fixed for hearing, an ex parte decree was passed:

AIYARAPPA MUDALIAR v. GULAM GHOUSE.

Held that the wrong description in the summons was a mere irregularity and that the decree was not a nullity on the ground that it had been passed against a person who was dead at the time the suit.

Miscellaneous appeal against the order of the Additional District Judge, Wardha, dated the 28th January 1913, reversing that of the Junior Munsif, Wardha, dated the 22nd April 1912.

Mr. M. Chackerbutty, for the Appellant.
Mr. A. C. Roy, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Suit No. 22 of 1908 in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Wardha, was based on a bond executed by one Viswanath. The defendant in that suit was described as Lalita, widow of Viswanath. The plaint shows that the defendant was sued as legal representative of the obligor. An ex parte decree was passed, but the defendant's liability was limited to the extent of the assets of her deceased husband. Viswanath had three wives—Annapurna, Lalita and Laxmi. Two of them had predeceased him. On the death of the surviving widow, which admittedly took place after the passing of the ex parte decree, Musammat Manjula, the daughter of Viswanath, was brought on the record as the legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor. She then took the objection that the decree had been obtained against a person who was dead at the time of the suit. Her case is that Laxmi alone survived her husband and that she was not made a party to Suit No. 22. Her objection has been disallowed by the executing Court on the ground that that Court had no power to go behind the decree. She now brings a suit for a declaration that the decree in Suit No. 22 is null and void. The defence is that all the wives of Viswanath came to be named Lalita after their marriage, and that the one who survived him was named Lalita. The first Court held that it was Laxmi who survived Viswanath and that Lalita was the name of the second wife only of Viswanath who had died before the suit. A declaratory decree was granted as prayed for. The lower Appellate Court has ordered an inquiry to be made as to whether the surviving widow was personally served or not, as the summons in that suit purports to bear her mark as Lalita, widow of Viswanath. Against this order of remand the plaintiff has filed this second appeal. Although there are no clear findings yet on the point by the District Judge, it may be assumed for the purposes of this appeal that Laxmi was the name of Viswanath's widow. It must also be assumed, till the inquiry on the point is completed, that she was personally served. Can the decree in these circumstances be treated as a nullity, as having been passed against a dead person? I think not. The suit was against the surviving widow of Viswanath. She may have been wrongly described as Lalita. If she had refused to sign the acknowledgment of service endorsed on the original summons, the question would have been quite different. Here she is said to have accepted the summons as a good summons ordering her to appear in Court on the date fixed for hearing, notwithstanding that she was wrongly described. In the absence of any fraud practised on her—and in this case there does not appear to be any such allegation—she must be taken to have waived the irregularity in describing her. The copy of the plaint, which is presumably sent with the summons, would have given her notice of the exact nature of the claim against her. She must have known that she was being sued as representing the estate of her deceased husband. I hold that if she had signed the summons, neither she nor the present plaintiff would be at liberty to question the decree as ultra vires. The appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

No appeal lies to the District Court against the order of a Revenue Court granting a review in a summary suit.

Petition, under section 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the order of the District Court of Tanjore, in Civil Miscellaneous Appeal No. 30 of 1911, preferred against that of the Court of the Revenue Divisional Officer of Kumbakonam, in Review Petition in Summary Suit No. 70 of 1910.

FACTS.—The suit was by a landlord against his tenant for rent. The main contention of the defendant was that the suit was barred by limitation. The Revenue Divisional Officer of Kumbakonam, who heard the case, upheld the plea of the defendant and dismissed the suit. The plaintiff thereupon applied for a review of this order on the ground that it was opposed to a decision of the High Court. The review applied for was granted. Against this order granting review, the defendant appealed to the District Judge who held that there was no appeal. The defendant thereupon preferred this civil revision petition to the High Court.

Mr. S. Muthia Mudaliar, for the Petitioner:—The District Judge erred in holding there was no appeal. Order XLIII, rule 1 (w), gives a right of appeal against all orders. Order XLVII, rule 7 (1) does not restrict this right.

Mr. T. V. Gopalasami Mudaliar, for the Respondent :—The District Judge was right in holding there was no appeal. Hari Charan Saha v. Baran Khan (1); Oravukundiyil Parkum Elavana Tholan v. Palankundy Kunhi Kutti (2) and Civil Miscellaneous Appeal No. 195 of 1910.

JUDGMENT.

OLDFIELD, J.—I agree with the learned District Judge that no appeal lay, the authorities in point being Hari Charan Saha v. Baran Khan (1) and Oravukundiyil Parkum Elavana Tolan v. Palankundy Kunhi Kutti (2).

The principle required was, moreover, stated also in an unreported decision of this Court in Civil Miscellaneous Appeal No. 195 of 1910. The civil revision petition is dismissed with costs.

(2) 18 Ind. Cas. 549; 24 M. L. J. 93; (1913) M. W N. 52.

TYABJI, J.—The cases cited by my learned brother are binding on us and we must follow them.

Had the matter been res integra, I should have been inclined to hold that the authorities above cited read into Order XLIII, rule 1 (w), of the Code of Civil Procedure words to the following effect: "Provided that no appeal shall lie from such an order except on the grounds referred to in Order XLVII, rule 7 (1)."

The three grounds mentioned in Order XLVII, rule 7, seem to me to be such as might to taken in limine. They refer to :

(a) the identity of the Judge;

(b) notice, or strict proof of the fact that the new matter was not within the applicant's knowledge;

(c) limitation.

With regard to these three objections the rule, in my opinion, permits two methods (or occasions) for taking them, viz.—

(1) at once by way of a special appeal from the order of review;

(2) at the hearing of the appeal from the final decree passed after the review.

That two methods or occasions are provided for these specified objections does not, in my opinion, derogate from the unrestricted right of appeal granted by Order XLIII, rule 1 (w), from all orders. Clause (w) does not contain any restriction as to the grounds on which the granting of the review application may be attacked in appeal.

The fact that these three objections might be taken at the final hearing as well as the special appeal (i.e., on both the occasions above referred to) does not imply that no other objections might be taken at the special appeal, to which Order XLIII, rule 1 (w), refers, without any restriction ; according to the interpretation above referred to, both provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, viz., those in Order XLIII, rule 1 (w), and Order XLVII, rule 7 (1), would be given effect to and I should have preferred this interpretation had I not felt concluded by authority. As it is, following the cases cited by my learned brother, the petition must be dismissed with costs.

Petition dismissed.

Mortgage—Conditional sale—Foreclosure proceedings —Expiry of year of grace—Lease by mortgagor—Acknowledgment of ownership—Decree for possession obtained by mortgagee—Formal possession taken—Validity of foreclosure proceedings cannot be questioned.

M mortgaged a house and shops to A by a deed of conditional sale on the 24th July 1894. The deed provided that the mortgagor was to remain in possession and pay interest. In default the mortgagee could take possession. If the mortgage was not redeemed within three years, the property was to be sold outright.

In 1898 the mortgagee got the foreclosure notice issued, and after the expiry of the year of grace without redemption in November 1899 M executed a lease mentioning the foreclosure proceedings and saying that he took the house on lease and handed over the rest of the property. In 1901 A sued for possession of the house and rent, got an ex parte decree, and took formal possession in execution, the dakhilnama being signed by M and others. Rai Bahadur Pandit Sheo Narain, Kunwar Dalip Singh and Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The defendants' father Malhi mortgaged two houses and some shops to plaintiffs' father by a deed of conditional sale on 24th July 1894. The deed provided that the mortgagor should remain in possession and should pay 6 annas per cent. per mensem interest, in default the mortgagee could take possession. If the mortgage was not redeemed within three years the property was to be sold outright.

In 1898 the mortgagee got the usual foreclosure notice issued. The year of grace expired without redemption having been effected and on 11th November 1899 Malhi executed a deed of lease, mentioning the foreclosure proceedings and saying that he took the houses on lease and had handed over the rest of the property. In 1901 the mortgagee (or owner) sued for possession of the houses and for rent, and got an ex parte decree against Malhi for possession of the houses and Rs. 45 rent. The mortgagee (or owner) took formal possession in execution proceedings; the dakhilnama was signed by Malhi and others. Since then defendants have again taken possession of the houses—Malhi is now dead—and plaintiffs sue for possession.

The defendants plead that the foreclosure proceedings were irregular, and this plea has been allowed on the ground that no copy of the application for issue of foreclosure notice was given to the mortgagor along with the notice. But the lower Courts have held that the mortgagor having acknowledged the mortgagee to be owner and executed a lease in his favour, and the mortgagee having subsequently obtained a decree, the defendants cannot now deny the plaintiffs' title or pick holes in the foreclosure proceedings. So the defendants have come to this Court. This is an appeal under section 70 (1) (b) of the old Punjab Courts Act.

For the appellants Mr. Muhammad Shafi first points out that apart from all foreclosure proceedings, the mortgagee was at liberty to take possession under the terms of the deed simply because the interest had not been paid. Further he urges that in the decree which was subsequently obtained the plaintiff was, no doubt, given a decree for possession, but that the decree does not say whether he is given a decree as mortgagee or as owner. But reference to the lease and to the plaint and judgment in the former suit makes it perfectly clear that the mortgagor, after the year of grace had expired, took the houses on lease recognizing the lessor as owner, and that the plaintiff subsequently sued not as mortgagee but as owner, and obtained a decree and took possession as owner.

The question now is whether Malhi's sons can question the validity of the foreclosure proceedings and deny plaintiffs' title. The learned Counsel for the appellants quotes the following rulings.

PALANIAPPA CHETTI v. RAMA NATHAN CHETTI.

Ramji v. Chinto Sakharam (1). This simply lays down that the mere expiry of the time laid down in the deed for redemption does not extinguish the right to redeem. This follows the English rule. In the case before us, however, we have to consider the effect of the foreclosure proceedings and of the subsequent conduct of the mortgagor.

Abdul Rahim v. Madhavrav Apaji (2). This follows the above ruling. Counsel points out that in this case, too, there was a decree. But it was a decree in a suit brought by the mortgagee "to recover a different mortgage-debt secured by different property," whereas in the present case the former decree passed against Malhi was for the same property as is now in dispute.

Kanhayalal v. Narhar Laxmanshet Varu (3). This, too, follows Ramji v. Chinto Sakharam (1). The parties acted for several years on the understanding that the mortgage had been converted into a sale, but it was held that there had been no fresh transaction independent of the mortgage and so it was held that the right to redeem still subsisted. Here, however, the lease seems to have been a fresh and independent transaction; it recognizes that the mortgagor's title has ceased and enters into an entirely new transaction of lease.

Then it is urged that Malhi's admission of the plaintiff's title was only an admission of law made under a mistake, and that in such cases there can be no estoppel. But here there has been more than an admission. Malhi not only admitted the title, but took the property in lease from the plaintiff as owner; and subsequently in a suit brought by the plaintiff as owner neglected to deny the plaintiff's title. Had not Malhi acted in this manner, it would have been perfectly easy for the plaintiff to cure the defect in the foreclosure proceedings by getting a new foreclosure notice issued. It is urged that plaintiffs could get a new foreclosure notice issued even now. This is true, but plaintiffs' position has very possibly altered for the worse, since Malhi's sons may now be in a position to redeem though presumably Malhi was not able to do so in 1899, as he had allowed the year of grace to expire which he would not have done had he been able to redeem.

We consider that the defendants are now estopped from denying plaintiffs' title.

We dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 53—Fraud against creditors, transfer of part of debtor's property, if constitutes—Mortgage-debt, discharge of.

The mere fact that a mortgagee acted as the agent of the mortgagors in collecting their outstandings, does not show that the mortgage-debt is discharged.

A transfer by a debtor, for a genuine debt, of part only of his property is not voidable under section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Ramnad at Madura, in Original Suit No. 329 of 1910.

FACTS.—Defendants Nos. 2 to 5, members of a banking firm, were heavily indebted to the firms of the plaintiff and of the 1st defendant (who was a close relation of theirs) in respect of adathi transactions between them. While on the eve of bankruptcy they mortgaged a portion of their immoveable properties to the 1st defendant's firm in respect of a portion of their dues. Later on, owing to the inability of the said firm to manage their affairs, the firm of the 1st defendant took up the management into its hands and collected some of its outstandings as its agent. The plaintiff firm, having obtained a decree against the firm of defendants Nos. 2 to 5, attached the properties mortgaged to the 1st defendant's firm. The latter preferred a claim and it was allowed. The present suit is for a declaration that the mortgage in favour of 1st defendant's firm was not binding on the plaintiff's firm, as being a fraud against creditors, and that further the same had been discharged. The Subordinate Judge found that the mortgage was a genuine transaction, that mere knowledge of the existence of other creditors did not make the transaction a fraudulent preference and that the mortgage in question had not been discharged. He, therefore, dismissed the suit. Hence this appeal.

Mr. K. N. Aiya, for the Appellants :—The non-production of accounts and the relationship of the parties clearly show that the transaction is a fraudulent one.

Mr. K. S. Jayaram Iyer, for the first Respondent :—The mortgage is perfectly valid. Mahomed Mira Ravuthar v. Savvasi Vijaya Raghunadha Gopalar (1); In re Jukes, Ex parte Official Receiver (2) and Hakim Lal v. Mooshahar Sahu (3).

JUDGMENT.—We agree with the Subordinate Judge. There is no evidence that the mortgage taken by the 1st defendant from the other defendants was discharged. The mere fact that the 1st defendant acted as agent to collect the Ragoon outstandings of the other defendants does not of itself show that the mortgage-debt was discharged. Nor can that mortgage be impeached under section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, as it was taken for a genuine debt, Mohamed Mirza Ravuthar v. Savvai Vijaya Raghunadha Gopalar (1), and was not of the whole of the debtor's property as in In re Jukes, Ex parte Official Receiver (2). The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Registration Act (XVI of 1908), s. 17—Grant of maintenance to Hindu widow—Writing not necessary—Oral evidence.

Under the Hindu Law, no transaction need be in writing; therefore a grant of immoveable property to a Hindu widow for maintenance, is perfectly valid if proved by oral evidence.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Seoni, dated the 28th February 1913, reversing that of the Munsif, Lakhnadon, dated the 15th January 1913.

Mr. A. C. Roy, for the Appellant.

Mr. J. C. Ghosh, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The lower Appellate Court has assumed that a grant of immoveable property to a Hindu widow for maintenance can only be made by a registered instrument. No reasons have been given by the District Judge for this view. The Munsif thought that this was the effect of section 17 of the Registration Act. But in this case there was admittedly no document. If there had been a document evidencing the grant, it would have required registration.

The Registration Act is silent as to whether a transaction must be in writing or not. No doubt the Transfer of Property Act requires certain transfers of certain value to be by a registered instrument. But this is not a case of sale, gift, mortgage, or lease. The transfer in question is one not specifically dealt with by that Act. The question must, therefore, be decided under the Hindu Law. No transaction need be in writing under that law. Therefore the grant, if proved by oral evidence, would be perfectly valid. The decree of the lower Appellate Court is reversed and the case remanded to that Court for a fresh decision with reference to the above remarks. There will be no order for refund of Court-fees. Other costs will follow the result.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 247—Partnership—Infant partner, liability of—Liability of infant partner to be adjudged insolvent—Position of infant in joint Hindu family business—Insolvency of one partner, effect of—Position of Receiver—Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907), s. 16.

An infant may be admitted to the benefits of a partnership, though he cannot be made personally liable for any obligation of the firm.

An infant partner of a firm cannot as such be adjudicated an insolvent.

There is no difference in principle between the nature of the liability of an infant admitted by agreement into partnership business and that of another on whose behalf an ancestral trade is carried on by the guardian.

Therefore, a Hindu infant on whose behalf a family trade is carried on is not personally liable for the debts incurred in such a trade, but his share therein is alone liable.

When a partner has been adjudged an insolvent, the partnership is not necessarily dissolved and the Receiver appointed under section 16 of the Provincial Insolvency Act merely replaces the insolvent partner in respect of the business of the firm and cannot claim, as Receiver in insolvency, to take exclusive possession of the entire assets of the firm.

Appeals against the orders of the District Judge, 24-Pergannas, dated respectively 15th and 28th May 1912.

Mr. Chakravarti, Counsel (with him Babus Umakali Mukherjee, Satish Chandra Mukherjee and Kshetra Gopal Benerjee), for the Appellant in No. 298 and for the Respondent in No. 264.

Dr. Rash Behary Ghosh (with him Babu Panchanan Ghosh, for Babu Kshetra Mohan Sen), for the Respondents in No. 298 and for Appellants in No. 264.

JUDGMENT.—These appeals are directed against an order under section 16 of the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1907. The circumstances under which the order in question has been made may be briefly narrated. One Bhuban Mohan Mandal left five sons, Nil Ratan, Amulya Charan, Satya Charan, Fatik Charan, Sannyasi Charan. During his life-time Bhuban Mohan Mandal carried on business in cloth, rice and fuel. After his death his sons, two of whom were infants, inherited the firms mentioned. On the 19th February 1912 Kishen Chand-Keshari Chand, the appellant in one of these appeals, made an application under the Provincial Insolvency Act to have the partners of these firms adjudicated insolvents. At the time the application was made, one of the two infants had already attained majority, but the other, Sannyasi Charan, was and is even now an infant. The District Judge found upon the evidence that the acts of insolvency imputed to four of these persons had been established, namely, that they had acted in the manner described in clauses (b) and (g) of section 4 of the Provincial Insolvency Act. The District Judge thereupon declared the four adult brothers insolvents. But he dismissed the application for adjudication of the infant as insolvent, because in his opinion the infant could not be declared an insolvent. He further appointed a Receiver and directed him to proceed to realise the assets of all the four brothers and of all the properties purchased since the death of Bhuban, and four-fifths only of the other properties which it was alleged had been inherited by all the five brothers from their father. Exception has been taken to this order by the infant as also by the creditor at whose instance these proceedings have been commenced.

The infant objects to the validity of the order on the ground that the Receiver was not competent to realise in its entirely the assets of the business and of the properties acquired since the death of his father. His contention is that the property of his four insolvent brothers alone had, under section 16 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, vested in the Receiver, who was consequently competent to realise a four-fifths share only of the assets of the partnership business as also of all after-acquired properties. The objection urged by the creditor is two-fold: namely, first, that the infant should have been adjudged an insolvent; and secondly, that in any view the Receiver was entitled to realise the whole of the properties inherited by the five brothers from their father.

The first question for determination is, whether the infant should have been adjudicated an insolvent. On behalf of the creditor it has been argued that although under the law of England, an infant is not liable to be adjudicated an insolvent, the principle on which that doctrine is based is not recognised in this country and consequently the doctrine itself should not be applied here. There is no room for controversy, as is clear from the decision of the House of Lords in Lovell and Christmas v. Gilbert Walter Beauchamp (1), that the District Judge correctly held that under the English Law, an infant partner cannot be adjudicated an insolvent. The question for determination is whether a different view should be taken under the Indian Law. Section 247 of the Indian Contract Act provides that a person who is under the age of majority, according to the law to which he is subject, may be admitted to the benefits of a partnership but cannot be made personally liable for any obligation of the firm; but the share of such minor in the property of the firm is liable for the obligations of the firm. It is not necessary for our present purpose to determine whether the principle which underlies section 247 is in harmony with the principle which underlies section 11 as interpreted by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas (2). But the position is incontrovertible that an infant may be admitted to the benefits of a partnership although he cannot be made personally liable for any obligation of the firm; yet the share of the infant in the property of the firm is liable for the obligations of the firm. It has been urged on behalf of the creditor-appellant that as the infant is liable to satisfy the debts of the firm, though it may be to the extent of his interest in the property of the firm, he is liable to be adjudicated an insolvent if it transpires that the debts of the firm cannot be satisfied out of the property of the firm. In our opinion, this contention is obviously fallacious. As regards the infant partner, the creditors of the firm are not entitled to proceed against him personally. They are restricted to a special fund, namely, his interest in the property of the firm. If the value of such interest is not sufficient for the satisfaction of the dues of the creditors, it cannot be maintained that the infant is unable to pay his debts which must be the true foundation of all proceedings in insolvency against him. The remedy of the creditors is restricted in its scope, and if that remedy is partial, it cannot be maintained that the person against whom the limited remedy is available is liable to be declared an insolvent. Indeed he may have ample funds other than the partnership assets, though such funds cannot be reached by the creditors of the firm, simply because under the law they cannot hold him personally liable to satisfy the obligations of the firm. We are of opinion that the law under the Indian Contract Act does not in this respect differ from the English Law on the subject and that here, as in England, an infant partner of a firm cannot as such be adjudicated an insolvent.

Our attention has been also invited to the circumstance that a joint Hindu family firm is not in all respects on the same footing as an ordinary partnership arising out of a contract. It has been argued that the rights and obligations of the co-parcener cannot be determined by exclusive reference to the provisions of the Indian Contract Act, but must be considered also with regard to the rules of the Hindu Law which regulate the transactions of Hindu families; and as an illustration of this fundamental difference, reference has been made to the rule that the death of one of the co-parceners does not dissolve a Hindu family partnership. This position may be accepted as sound. But it is equally clear that there is no difference in principle between the nature of the liability of an infant admitted by agreement into a partnership business and that of another on whose behalf an ancestral trade is carried on by his guardian. It is on this basis that it has been ruled in the cases of Joykisto Cowar v. Nityanundnundy (3) and Rampartab Samrathrai v. Foolibai (4), that a Hindu infant on whose behalf a family trade is carried on is not personally liable for the debts incurred in such a trade, but his share therein is alone liable. In so far as the propriety of the order of the District Judge with regard to the infant is concerned, we must consequently overrule the contention of the creditor.

The question next arises, what is the precise position of the Receiver appointed under section 16 of the Provincial Insolvency Act? On behalf of the creditor, it has been argued that he is entitled to take possession of and to realise the entire assets of the trading firms, all the after-acquired properties and also all ancestral properties inherited by the five brothers. In support of this proposition reliance has been placed upon the decision of the House of Lords in Lovell Christmas v. Gilbert Walter Beauchamp (1). That case, at first sight, seems to lend some support to the contention of the creditor, but upon closer examination, turns out to be of no real assistance to him. In that case, Gilbert Walter Beauchamp was a partner in the firm of Beauchamp and Brothers. He was an infant and the other partner was Ralph Beauchamp. Goods which had been supplied upon the order of the firm were not paid for. An action was consequently brought in the Queen's Bench Division against the firm in the firm's name. An appearance was entered for Ralph and also for Gilbert, the infant, by his guardian ad litem. Objection was taken on behalf of the latter that the infant could not be made liable. This objection was overruled, and on the 2nd August 1893 an order was made, adjudging the plaintiff to recover against the defendants the sum claimed. A similar judgment was obtained by another creditor who has supplied goods to the firm. On appeal to the Divisional Court to set aside the latter judgment, the appeal was dismissed, but it was also ordered that execution was not to issue against the separate property of the infant or against his share, if any, in the partnership profits. The Court of Appeal refused to disturb the order thus made by the Divisional Court [Harris v. Beauchamp (5)]. On the 2nd August 1893, that is, on the date when the first judgment had been obtained, Lovell and Christmas (the persons who had obtained the judgments) served a bankruptcy notice on Beauchamp Brothers, founded on their judgments, intimating that if the requisitions of the notices were not complied with, an act of bankruptcy would be committed. The money was not paid and the creditors presented a petition for a receiving order in respect of the estate of Beauchamp Brothers, whereupon a receiving order was made. This order was rescinded by the Court of Appeal on the ground that as one of the partners was an infant, the receiving order could not properly be made against the firm [In re Beauchamp Brothers (6)]. The Court of Appeal granted leave to appeal to the House of Lords, but on the term that the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division of the 2nd August 1893 should be treated as affirmed in the Court of Appeal, with leave to the respondent Gilbert to lodge a cross-appeal. The position consequently was that when the matter was taken to the House of Lords, the question of the validity of the judgment in the suit against the firm as also of the order made in the partnership proceeding were both open for consideration. It was under these circumstances that Lord Herschell stated that the judgment was erroneous and required to be amended; and he directed it to be amended by the insertion of the words "other than Gilbert Walter Beauchamp" after the word "defendants." Lord Herschell after giving the direction proceeded to observe as follows: "I think the proper course will be to amend it in the manner which I have suggested. It will thus constitute, as from its date, a valid receiving order against Ralph Beauchamp, and, I think, the Receiver appointed under that order should also be appointed Receiver of the partnership assets for the purpose of protecting them for the benefit of the creditors." It is plain that the order authorising the Receiver to deal with the partnership assets for the purpose of protecting them for the benefit of the creditors was made, not merely in the partnership proceeding, but also in the proceeding on the judgment against the firm, as there was in fact a judgment against the firm represented by the adult partner. The decision of the House of Lords cannot consequently be rightly regarded as an authority for the proposition that in a bankruptcy proceeding, it is open to the Court to direct the Receiver to deal with assets other than those belonging to the persons who had been adjudged insolvents. It would indeed be surprising if the Court could, in a proceeding under the Insolvency Act, deal with the property of a person who had not been adjudged an insolvent. This is plain from familiar statements in books of authority. "On the bankruptcy of one only of several partners the joint assets do not vest in the trustee. Consequently an action in the Chancery Division to ascertain the share of the bankrupt was formerly necessary, but now under section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the Court in Bankruptcy can ascertain such share. It is, however, not so in the case of an infant." [Lindley on Partnership, 8th Edition, page 762]. Section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to which reference is made, is in these terms: "Every Court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under the Act shall have full power to decide all questions of priorities and all other questions whatsoever, whether of law or of fact, which may arise in any case of bankruptcy coming within the cognisance of the Court, or which the Court may deem it expedient or necessary to decide for the purpose of doing complete justice or making a complete distribution of property in any such case." To the rule thus laid down a proviso is added that "the jurisdiction hereby given shall not be exercised by any County Court for the purpose of adjudicating upon any claim, not arising out of the bankruptcy, which might heretofore have been enforced by action in the High Court, unless all parties to the proceeding consent thereto or the money, money's worth, or right in dispute does not in the opinion of the Judge exceed in value £200." The following is an accurate statement of the principles which govern the matter now before us: "Upon the bankruptcy of a partner, his power over the partnership property ceases from the commencement of the bankruptcy and his share of the property, that is, of the surplus after payment of the partnership debts and the claims of all his co-partners, will vest together with his all other separate estate, in his trustee, who in respect of the bankrupt's share of the partnership assets will become tenant-in-common with the solvent partner and entitled to have the partnership affairs wound up according to the rule in bankruptcy" [Robson on Bankruptcy, 7th Edition, page 682]. This position is amply supported by judicial decisions of the highest authority, amongst which may be mentioned specially Fox v. Hanbury (7); Ex parte Ruffin (8) and Fraser v. Kershaw (9).

We may observe that the principle formulated in the cases just mentioned rests on the theory familiar to English lawyers, that the bankruptcy of one partner operates as a dissolution of the partnership among all the partners, Fox v. Hanbury (7); Ex parte Smith (10) and Crawshay v. Collins (11). It is essential to note, however, that the effect of the bankruptcy of a partner on the partnership is not, in this country, indentical with that under the Law of England, as becomes clear from a comparison of section 33 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, with the provisions of sections 253 and 254 of the Indian Contract Act. Under the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, bankruptcy is placed on the same footing as death, and there is a dissolution of partnership by reason of the death or bankruptcy of one of the partners. In section 253 of the Indian Contract Act, on the other hand, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, the relation of partners to each other is determined by the death of any partner, whereas under section 254, at the suit of a partner the Court may dissolve the partnership when a partner, other than the partner suing, has been adjudicated an insolvent under any law relating to insolvent debtors. Thus whereas in England the bankruptcy of a partner works a dissolution without an order of the Court, in this country the bankruptcy of a partner may have the same effect only if a suit is instituted for dissolution of partnership on that ground by a partner other than the one who has been adjudged insolvent. Consequently in this country, when a person has been adjudicated an insolvent, the partnership is not necessarily dissolved, and the Receiver who is appointed under section 16 of the Provincial Insolvency Act merely re-places the insolvent partner in respect of the business of the firm, that is, the Receiver and the partners who have not been adjudicated insolvents continue to constitute the firm. It may possibly be open to the Receiver to take steps for the dissolution of the partnership, but he cannot claim as Receiver in insolvency to take exclusive possession of the assets of the firm, including, in this case, the interest of the infant who has not been adjudicated an insolvent. We are clearly not concerned in the present proceedings with the question, whether the particluar debt which the creditor seeks to realise may be realisable from the interest of the infant in the firm; that is a question which can be adjudicated in a suit properly framed for the purpose. What concerns the Court in these proceedings is the true position of the Receiver in relation to the partnership property. As regards such property, we feel no doubt whatever that he is not entitled to deal with the entire assets, inclusive of the interest of the infant who has not been adjudicated an insolvent.

A question has been raised before us not only as to the partnership assets but also as to what has been described as the after-acquired properties. On behalf of the creditor it has been contended that the after-acquired properties have not only been acquired out of the funds of the partnership, but that they have been treated as part of the partnership property. In the view we take the distinction suggested is immaterial, because whether what is described as after-acquired property be treated as included in the partnership assets or be deemed independent thereof, the Receiver is not entitled to take possession of and to deal with more than the four-fifths share held by the persons adjudicated insolvents. In respect of these properties the Receiver is precisely in the same position as the persons who have been adjudicated insolvents and have been re-placed by him by operation of law. The essence of the matter is that the share of the infant has not vested in him, and he is consequently not entitled to deal with it. The Receiver may, if so advised, institute a suit for dissolution of the partnership, in which appropriate proceedings may be taken for realization of the assets. The creditor also may, if so advised, pursue his remedy, if any, against the infant in a suit properly framed for enforcement of his claim. But whatever remedies may be available hereafter to the Receiver or to the creditor, it is clear that the properties of the infant cannot be dealt with by either of them in these proceedings.

The result is that the appeal of the creditor (No. 298 of 1912) is dismissed and the appeal of the infant (No. 264 of 1912) is allowed. The order of the District Judge is varied in the manner following. The Receiver will take possession of four-fifths share of the business and four-fifths share of all the properties purchased since the death of Bhuban Mohan Mandal as also four-fifths share of other properties jointly held by the infant and his brothers.

The creditor will pay the costs of the infant in both the appeals. We assess the hearing fee in each case at one gold mohur.

A limited right of management of an endowment can be prescribed for as well as any other limited right.

A document containing an assertion of certain rights, though not a public document within the meaning of section 35 of the Evidence Act, is admissible in evidence under section 13.

A suit to recover possession of certain villages as hukdar and for an injunction restraining defendants from interfering with the plaintiff in the discharge of his duties is barred by limitation when it appears that the right of management has been in the adverse possession of the defendant for nearly 60 years before suit. Section 10 of the Limitation Act has no application to such a suit.

This appeal coming on for hearing on 16th, 20th, 21st, 22nd and 23rd days respectively of October 1914, and having stood over for consideration till this day, the Court delivered the following

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, OFFG. C. J.—This is a suit brought by the Pandarasannadhi of the Tiruvaduthurai Mutt against the Manager of the Madura Temple and the Temple Committe of the Madura District to recover possession with mesne profits of four villages as hukdar or Trustee of the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai, or endowment for the performance of certain ceremonies in the Madura Temple, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with him in the discharge of his duties. The District Judge has found that he has not shown that he was ever entitled to possession and also that his suit is barred. With the latter conclusion I agree, but as the case may not stop here and has been very fully argued, I propose to state my reasons for differing from the conclusions at which the District Judge has arrived on the facts. It may well be that in the opinion of those best qualified to judge, the Manager appointed by the Temple Committee would be a much more satisfactory Trustee of the endowment than the plaintiff but, this of course is not a matter which can affect our judgment as to the effect of the evidence. The judgment of the District Judge contains an elaborate examination of the voluminous documentary evidence in the case, but fails altogether, in my opinion, to recognise the strength of plaintiff's case upon facts which are either admitted or proved beyond reasonable doubt. It is not disputed that the endowment of the four suit villages and another, which has ceased to belong to it, was founded by one Thanappa Mudaly whose name it bears, long before Madura came under the Government of the East India Company at the beginning of the nineteenth century. According to the tradition he was a Minister of the ruling Nayak at the beginning of the eighteenth century. It is also not disputed that the donors of endowments, such as this, for temple purposes were in the habit of appointing separate Trustees, or that many such endowments in different temples in Southern India were entrusted to the predecessor of the plaintiff Pandarasannadhi and were managed by him through the agency of Thambirans, as his ascetic followers are called, who resided in Mutts belonging to him in the neighbourhood of the temples in question. He has been compared in one of the cases to a bishop, but his position more resembles that of an abbot of a monastery with dependant priories or Mutts in different parts of India, many of them in charge of a single ascetic or Thambiran.

There is one such Mutt at Madura which bears an inscription showing that it was presented to the Mutt by Chockalinga Mudaliar, son of Koneriappa Mudaly, son of Thanappa Mudaly, or by all three persons as the words "son of" are not in the original. This shows that the Pandarasannadhis were the Gurus or religious superiors of the family, and makes it exceedingly likely that the founder or his heirs should have entrusted this endowment, according to a very usual practice, to the care of the Pandarasannadhi, more especially as during the time of the Nayaks there does not seem to have been any Temple trustee and the general management of the temple seems to have been in the hands of the Government itself.

Down to the present time a Thambiran appointed by the plaintiff and residing at the Mutt performs the duties of Vicharanai or Manager of the Kattalai as regards the ceremonial observances; and it is not disputed that this office is vested in the plaintiff and discharged on his behalf by one of the Thambirans. There is no reason for doubting that his possession of this office goes back far beyond the introduction of the Company's Government, either to the time of the founder or of his grandson who built the Mutt, and the fact that in the accounts at the beginning of last century, H series, the word Vicharanai is used in connection with the mangement of the property of the endowment as well as the ceremonies, suggests that both were in the hands of the Thambiran as agent of the Pandarasannadhi. All that is in question in the present suit is his right to possession of the four suit villages which admittedly originally formed part of the endowment and were attached under the Muhammadan Government and retained under attachment under the Company's rule. His case is that they were in his possession when first attached and that whilst under attachment they were held on his behalf, and there are strong grounds for thinking this was the case down to 1849 when the Company handed them over to the temple authorities.

There are other villages and lands belonging to the endowment which were not attached and which continue in the plaintiff's possession down to the present day. None of these villages or lands are shown to have been acquired subsequently to the introduction of the Company's rule, and the most reasonable explanation to my mind appears to be that they were additions to the original endowment of five villages made from time to time to the Pandarasannadhi for the purposes of the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai of which he was the Trustee. One of these villages is entered in the Inam Register as Koneriappa Mudaly Kattalai, which would point to its having been given by Thanappa Mudaly's son who bore that name (Exhibit AJ). The District Judge is largely influenced by the fact that these lands and villages have always been in the possession of the plaintiff, whereas the suit villages have never been in his possession since the introduction of the Company's Government in 1801. A simple explanation of this is that those other villages and lands escaped attachment under the Muhammadan Government, whereas the suit villages did not. The suit villages stood in the Madura revenue accounts in the name of this Kattalai with numerous other Devastanam villages which under the Hindu Rulers had been exempted from assessment; and after the Muhammadan Government took Madura, they were all dealt with as a fresh source of revenue. Of the other villages Kadipatte was in the Saptur Zemindari and not separtely assessable, and other villages were outside the District of Madura, while the other lands were in villages which did not come within the class of Devastanam villages. When the Muhammadans took Madura they appear to have at first imposed a Poruppu, which is the name for a favourable quit-rent as distinct from the full assessment, upon the Devastanam villages, and later on in the financial embarrassments in which they found themselves, they resumed all these villages and merely made such allowances as they chose for the upkeep of the temples, etc. This was the state of things which the Company found existing in this and other districts when they took over the Government at the beginning of the last century. Among the villages which the Company found under attachment were the suit villages belonging to the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai.

The only evidence as to any one but the Pandarasannadhi and his agents having anything to do with this Kattalai before the Company's time is to be found in Exhibit H7, an extract from the accounts of 1816, in which the endowment is said to have been made by Thanappa Mudaly in the time of Vijiaranga Chokanada Nayakar, and Vedanayaga Bhattar and Tirumalaya Pillai are entered under the heading, "Name of previous mirasidars", as the persons who got the Danam or gift. Nothing is known of these persons, it is not stated that any office was granted them, and the same account enters under the head of "Name of person entitled to manage, etc.," Manickavachaka Thambiran Paradesi of Tiruvaduthurai Mutt, Vicharanai or Manager, thus showing that the management was then in the hands of the plaintiff's agent. As I have already said, the effect of Exhibit H7 is to show that the general management at the time was in the hands of the Thambiran. Exhibit C, an extract from accounts for 1799, refers to the five villages as inam villages of the temple of Minakshy Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai, but does not show that any one but the plaintiff's predecessor was the trustee of this endowment. Nor is the fact entitled to any weight that in Exhibit D7 one of the villages, Amur, is referred to as the temple Kattalai, whereas in Exhibit D5 of the previous year it is referred to as a Thanappa Mudaly Arakattalai village. The defendants also rely on Exhibit V*a*, which is a list of pattadars or lease-holders of the village of Velangudi from the accounts of 1801, in which Arakattalai Nallaperumal Pillai appears as one of the pattadars. This is one of the Kattalai villages which has been all along down to the present in the possession of the plaintiff, and the accounts prove nothing. The defendants also refer to Exhibit V, an extract from the Revenue accounts relating to the temple for 1802, in which under the heading "person who is Kattalai Vicharanai or Manager," are entered the names of two persons, Nallaperumal Pillai—possibly the same person whose name was found in Exhibit V*a*—and Ponnambala Pillai. This merely shows that these two persons, under what circumstances does not appear, were then discharging in the year 1801 the office of Vicharanai of the Kattalai, which has admittedly been discharged by the plaintiff through his agents from 1816, the date of Exhibit H7, down to the present time. It may very well have been that the post of the Thambiran of the Mutt was vacant at the time the Company took over, but we never hear of any one but the Thambiran being in management. Exhibit E, an extract from an account relating to the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai for 1814, under the heading, "purpose for which inam was granted and in whose charge," mentions Amur village as granted to the temple, Chettikulam as granted to Thanappa Mudaly Arakattalai and the other villages of Chinna Ulgani and Kasulkolam as being in charge of Manickavachaka Thambiran. Here so far as any one is mentioned as in charge of the villages, it is the Thambiran. As the position was admittedly the same with regard to all these villages, these divergencies as to the different villages show that the statements in these accounts are to be received with caution. Exhibit D series shows that from 1801 to 1817 the income of the villages, after deducting the Poruppu or quit-rent, was paid to the inamdar, but leaves it open who the inamdar was. Exhibit H6 is an account of the revenue collections for 1816 from all the Kattalai villages in charge of Government at that time showing as to each the amount payable after deducting Poruppu, mentioning the name of the person superintending the Kattalai, to whom presumably the money was to be paid for the performance of the Kattalai as no one else is mentioned. Manickavachaka Thambiran is shown as the person superintending the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai and was presumably the person to whom payment was made. This Exhibit, in my opinion, very strongly supports the plaintiff's case that from the time the Company assumed the Government in 1801 down to 1816, the net income after deduction of quit-rent was paid to the Thambiran as Manager; and he relies on the statement to this effect contained in Exhibits B1 and B2, extracts from books produced from the Collector's office, and in Exhibit O4, which will be noticed subsequently.

In 1817 there was admittedly a change in consequence of the passing of Regulation VII of 1817 which gave the Board of Revenue complete control over temples and endowments. Instead of the income being paid over as formerly to the Superintendents of the different Kattalais, Tasdiks or budgets were framed for each Kattalai providing for the expenses of the Kattalai, and only so much of the income was paid over as was sufficient to provide for this expenditure, the balance being reserved in the hands of Government. Exhibits G and G2 as the Tasdiks for 1817, and the fact that the Thambiran is only allotted a small salary of 3 pons per month as Vicharanai or Manager, and that Exhibit G2 directs that payments are only to be made to the employees, among whom apparently the Thambiran was included, if they discharge their duties, are relied on by the defendants to show that it was not intended that payments should be disbursed through the Thambiran. Exhibits J and I show that the Thambiran continued in management of the other villages and lands, though it appears from Exhibit II of 1824 that, under the powers conferred by Regulation VII of 1817, he was required to account for his collections, and the village of Kudipatti was attached for failure to perform his duties. It further appears that in 1836 a new Tasdik or budget was framed including for the first time the revenues of these other villages which, however, were still left to be collected by the Thambiran, as they still are.

Very much has been made on the part of the defendants of the subordinate position to which the Thambiran as Vicharanai or Manager of the endowment was reduced in this period in the exercise of powers conferred by Regulation VII of 1817, but, in my opinion, too much weight should not be attached to this, as we find that the same control was exercised over the collections of the villages and lands belonging to the Kattalai of which the Pandarasannadhi was admittedly Trustee in possession as over the collections of the villages which were under attachment. If this control was not inconsistent with the Pandarasannadhi being Trustee or hukdar of the other villages and lands, though deprived of all effective authority, it is equally not inconsistent with his having been hukdar or Trustee of the suit villages which were under attachment from the time Company took over. As regards the smallness of the Thambiran's salary it must be remembered that he was an ascetic, and it seems not improbable that the amount allowed him in the Tasdik was the amount which he had been allowed to spend on himself when the income was paid over to him.

I have now to deal with what seems to me a very important part of the case. In 1836 Mr. Blackburn, the Collector of Madura addressed instructions, Exhibit B, to the peishkar or Revenue Officer of the district instructing him with referrence to the Devastanam and Chuttram villages, that is to say, the villages belonging to endowments for religious and charitable purposes, which had been attached by the Company and were then under the peishkar's control as regards income and expenditure, to inquire and report under whose management they were before the attachment by the Company, that is to say, before 1801. He was to furnish full information as to the Vicharanai or Manager, particulars of the Kattalai, the name of the founder and of the present hukdar or Trustee, the names of the villages, who made the collections, who incurred the expenditure and to whom accounts were rendered. He was also required to state the year in which the Tasdik or budget system was introduced, and the year in which a new Tasdik or budget was framed. The inquiry was held, and the result was recorded in two books which were produced at the trial from the Collector's office, the extracts relating to the endowment, which are duplicates being marked as Exhibits B1 and B2. How the other Kattalais were dealt with we do not know, as the parties and the Pleaders were not allowed to inspect the rest of the book; what we find as to the suit Kattalai is a statement taken from Namasivaya Thambiran, Vicharanai (Manager) of the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai, who was admittedly the representative of the Pandarasannadhi. The book as a whole was signed by the Gumastah who copied the statements into it and countersigned by the peishkar who put it forward as embodying the result of his inquiry. The fact that in the performance of his duty to inquire and report the peishkar contented himself as regards this Kattalai with recording a statement from the Thambiran, is to my mind very strong evidence that he was recognised at the time as Vicharanai or Manager and hukdar of the endowment, including the suit villages, as the plaintiff's agent, and that there was no other claimant in the field in the shape of the temple itself as any one else. The general effect of the statement taken from the Thambiran is also in entire accordance with the inferences which I draw from the earlier evidence which I have already examined. It, no doubt, represents not only the suit villages, but the other properties as well, as forming part of the original endowment, whereas it is more probable that they were acquired subsequently before the Company's time. The account of the way in which the five villages came into the hands of the Company is also not candid, as they are represented as having been taken over at the request of the hukdar, whereas we knew from Mr. Hurdis' report Exhibt A that the Company found these as well as the other Devastanam villages under attachment and so continued them. I see no reason to doubt the next statement that under the Company the income of the villages after deducting the Poruppu or quit-rent had been paid over from the Government Treasury to the Thambiran and that he had performed the Kattalai with the aid of such income and the income of the other properties in his possession until November 1817, when a budget, Exhibit G1, was introduced, after which another budget, Exhibit G1, was introduced in 1833. In so far as it relates to the matters on which he was required to report I think the peishkar must be taken to have accepted this as satisfactory statement. I am entirely unable to agree with the statement of the District Judge in paragraph 14 of his judgment that Exhibits B1 and B2 have not the slightest probative value.

I do not consider it necessary to go into the rest of the evidence in detail. Exhibit N series is an interesting series of public documents showing the change of policy as to the connection of Government with temples. In 1842 they gave up the management and appointed a Manager for the Madura Temple in the exercise of the powers given them by Regulation VII of 1817. In 1849 they decided also to give up possession of the Devastanam villages, including the suit villages, which they had retained under attachment since 1801. If I am right in the conclusion I have come to, the plaintiff through his agent was then entitled to possession. As regards the villages attached to various Kattalais in the Madura Temple, the Collector in Exhibit O2 proposed to hand them over to the temple Manager, and the Board, in Exhibit O 3, dated the 25th May 1849, approved of this course in the case of the suit villages, whilst directing generally that claims by the descendants of the founders might be reported for special consideration. Shortly after this on the 2nd June 1849 we find a descendant of Thanappa Mudaly putting forward in Exhibit O4 a claim that the suit villages should be handed over to him jointly with the Pandarasannadhi. He asserted that his ancestors had put the villages in possession of the Pandarasannadhi, and that his descendants had been managing the property with him, and that they should not be handed over to the temple Manager, who was a mere stranger. The endorsement refusing the petition accepts the petitioner's statement that he was agent or hukdar with the Pandarasannadhi and states that the villages had never been in possession of the hukdars since the attachment by the Company, but that they had been receiving settled Dastabery—the budgeted allowances, first from Government direct, and afterwards (subsequently to 1842) from the Manager of the temple out of the net income of the villages; and as the management which had been in the hands of Government had been handed over to the temple Manager, it was only right that these villages should be handed over also, and these were the Board's orders. We do not hear of the descendants of the Thanappa Mudaly having claimed before or since, and their intervention may have been invited in view of the fact that in the proceeding already cited the Board had stated that it would only recognise the claims of descendants of the founders. This endorsement, however, appears to me to be a recognition of the Pandarasannadhi's position as hukdar or Trustee of these villages, though accompanied by a refusal to restore them to him on the ground he had been so long out of possession. It is significant that it was not suggested on this occasion that the villages were being handed over to the temple Manager because the temple itself and not the Pandarasannadhi was the hukdar, which is now the case for the defendants. The Pandarasannadhi did not contest, as he might have done, the handing over of these villages to the temple Manager in 1849, nor did he apparently claim to have them registered in his name at the Inam Commission in 1863, and they were registered in the name of the temple Manager, Exhibits K10, K14, K15, and K16. In conclusion I may mention that the position of the plaintiff as hukdar was recognised by the temple authorities in the litigation of the seventies. The opposite theory, in my opinion, fails to account for the connection of the plaintiff with the endowment and appears to proceed on grounds which are highly speculative. Whatever the reasons which induced the Pandarasannadhi to acquiesce in the suit villages being handed over to the Manager of the Temple in 1849, there is no doubt that they have since been in possession of the Manager of the temple when there was one and when these were not in the possession and management of the local temple Committee under Act XX of 1863 who for some periods managed the affairs of the temple themselves instead of appointing a manager as they are required to do under the Act. Their possession equally with that of the Manager when there was one, was clearly on behalf of the temple, and also as it seems to me on the facts already stated clearly adverse to the plaintiff. It is no doubt true that the plaintiff has all along been in possession of the office of hukdar of the Kattalai so far as the ceremonial observances are concerned and also in possession of the other villages and lands belonging to the endowment through accounts for their proceeds, but he has been out of possession of the suit villages which have been in the management of the temple claiming adversely to him, though the revenues of these villages have also been applied for the purposes of the endowment. It has been contended for the plaintiff that a limited right of possession and management of part of the endowments of a religious office could not be acquired by prescription. Admittedly there is no direct authority for this proposition, which was also raised before me in another appeal from Madura (Appeal No. 31 of 1909) where, however, it was unnecessary to decide the point. I cannot see why a limited right of management of an endowment should not be prescribed for as well as any other limited right, and I agree with my learned brother that the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Balwant Rao v. Puran Mal Chaube (1), which was not cited in the argument, is an authority that it may. The plaintiff in that case in their Lordships' opinion was "suing only for his own right to manage or in some way to control the management of the endowment," and it was held that such a right might become barred. In the present case I think the limited right of management claimed by the plaintiff in this suit has been barred by adverse possession for nearly sixty years before suit, and that on this ground the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I have the misfortune to differ from the learned Chief Justice on the facts of the case, and I am, therefore, obliged to examine them in greater detail than I would otherwise have done.

The plaintiff in this case is the Pandarasannadhi of the Tiruvaduthurai Mutt. The first defendant is the Manager of the Minakshy Sundareswara Devastanam at Madura. The other defendants are the members of the Temple Committee.

The plaintiff's case is that the villages in dispute were granted by one Thanappa Mudaly for performing certain "Pujas" in the temple at Madura (the endowment is known as "Thanappa Mudali Kattalai"), that his predecessor-in-title, as head of the "Thiruvaduthurai Adinam," was appointed hereditary Trustee in respect of the said endowment, that he was in possession and enjoyment of those villages, that on his behalf the British Government were managing the villages, that after the constitution of the Temple Committee, under Act XX of 1863, the Committee was managing on his behalf, that the present Manager refused either to account to the plaintiff for the income received from the villages or to deliver over possession of the properties to him and that consequently he is entitled to recover possession or to be paid the income. The defendants denied that the plaintiff was ever constituted Trustee of the Kattalai, and pleaded that the villages were directly given to the temple, that certain agents of the plaintiff at Madura were entrusted as paid servants with the management of the Kattalai from time to time, that the plaintiff had no right either to the management or to the possession of the properties, and that the claim in respect of possession was barred by limitation. The most important issue relates to the plaintiff's predecessor having been constituted Trustee by Thanappa Mudali: The other questions are covered by issue IX which runs as follows:—"Whether the defendants' possession of the suit properties is only on behalf of the plaintiff and permissive and if not, whether the suit is in time."

The District Judge held that there was no evidence of the plaintiff's predecessor having been constituted Trustee of the Kattalai, that the defendants were not agents of the plaintiff in the management of the villages and that the claim was barred by limitation. The plaintiff has appealed.

Before dealing with the questions relating to the plaintiff's title and the bar of limitation, I must make a few remarks on the term "Kattalai." That expression is used with reference to three different kinds of endowments. Properties may be endowed for the performance of "Pujas" in the temple, or for the performance of certain festivals in the temple, or for the performance of "Archanas" to the deity in the name of the donor. In the first class of cases, the endowment is utilised for conducting the necessary and vital part of the worship and of the ritual in the temple. Ordinarily, the Puja is not performed in the name of the donor and consequently supplemental grants are made for the purpose of the service being more efficiently performed. Instances of this nature are to be found in the famous temple at Chidambaram where almost all the necessary daily services are conducted by means of Kattalais endowed by pious donors. In the second class of cases where grants are made for the purpose of "Ootsavams," if in consequence of a rise in prices or for other reasons the funds are not sufficient for performing a festival on the same scale as was begun with by the original donor, it is usual for others to supplement the funds either by making permanent grants of land or money or by yearly contributions towards the celebration of the festival. It has to be remembered that it is not uncommon among Hindus to make anonymous gifts. The preferable form of gift is for the donor to remain unnamed. Consequently, it very often happens that, where the funds in respect of a particular service or festival are not sufficient for conducting them on the original scale, new donors come forward to supplement those funds. In the third class of cases (for example, the Pachaiyappa's Kattalais in various parts of the Presidency) where grants are made for performing "Archanas" in the name of the donor either daily or on stated occasions, if the funds are not sufficient to meet the expenses, others will not come forward to supplement the resources. The "Archana" is intended solely for the grantor and it is not the concern of third parties to help in its performance if the funds are for any reason not fund sufficient. In the present case Thanappa Mudali's Kattalai was intended for two services known as the "Oochikala" or mid-day service and "Ardhajama" or mid-night service. These are more important than festivals and unlike Archanas they cannot be dispensed with. They are a necessary function of the worship of the idol. I have made these remarks in order that the history of the subsequent additions to this Kattalai may be understood in their proper perspective.

It was argued by Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar for the plaintiff that if a service is known by a particular name and if its expenses have been met from a particular source, it is not likely that that source will be supplemented by contributions from other donors. I do not think this contention is well-founded. As I have already stated, subsequent donors very often add to the funds devoted for a necessary ritual in the temple. The first question for consideration is whether Thanappa Mudaly constituted the Thiruvaduthurai Adhinam the hereditary Trustee of the Kattalai in question. It is admitted that no written grant relating to this endowment exists. It is said (see Exhibit B1) that the papers relating to the grant were lost during the Muhammadan invasion. The suggestion is that they were with the agents of the plaintiff in Madura. There is no reason why the title-deed should not have been in Tanjore, the headquarters of the Adhinam, where it is well-known that grants of this description are carefully preserved by the head of the Mutt. One would have expected a copper-plate grant to have been produced if the story of the plaintiff is true. It is the case both for the plaintiff and the defendants that the original donor, Thanappa Mudaly, was the Pradhan or Prime Minister of Vijiaranga Chokanatha, who ruled in Trichinopoly between the years 1704 to 1731. This King granted the suit villages to his Minister in order that he might endow them to the temple. It is, therefore, most likely that some writing evidencing the grant would have been executed to the plaintiff's Mutt if it was constituted Trustee. I am not satisfied that the allegation that the papers relating to the grant were lost at the time of the Muhammadan invasion, has any foundation. There is absolutely no evidence given in this case as to what those papers were and how and when they were lost.

On the other hand, it seems clear that the grant was made to the temple itself and not to the plaintiff's predecessor. Mr. Nelson in his interesting Manual of the District of Madura says that the temple was nominally under the direct supervision of the Kings of Madura, and that they appointed a chief Brahmin priest to look after the temple properties (see Madura Manual, part III, page 159). As pointed out by Mr. Ghose in his "Tagore Law Lectures" on "Hindu Law relating to Impartible Property and Endowments," the idea of a shebait and a Trustee is a modern one. He says that "in ancient Hindu society when there were no regular trusts or trust-deeds, in the case of the setting up of an idol, gifts of land were usually made to priests and other persons who were necessary for carrying on the worship." Mr. Nelson's account that the properties of the temple were managed by the Kings through a chief Brahmin priest is in accordance with what happens in Hindu temples throughout India. And, if a Brahmin priest was in management of this temple, the grant would have been made to him on behalf of the temple and not to the plaintiff's predecessor who had his headquarters in the District of Tanjore. This is borne out by the report of Mr. Hurdis (Exhibit A) in which he says that the Church Brahmins, as he calls the priests, were in possession of the properties belonging to the temple. It was pointed out in Ramasami v. Ramasami (2) that in most of the temples in this Presidency there are no regular Trustees, but that the Archakar or Pujari Brahmin is really both the officiating priest and the secular manager of the affairs of the temple. In this case there is Exhibit H7 which places the matter beyond doubt. This is an extract from the account of Fasli 1226 relating to the temple which was kept in the Collector's Office. In the column relating to the name of the previous Mirasidar, the entry is "person who got the danam," "Vedanayaga Bhattar and Tirumalayya Pillai." Under the heading of the "name of the grantor" the entry is "Thanappa Mudali who was the Pradhan of Vijiaranga Chockanatha—it is 90 years." There can be no doubt that this document comes from proper custody and contains the information available in 1816 regarding the persons who made the grant, and the persons who received the gift. This Vedanayaga Bhattar, it is conceded, was a Brahmin. The word Bhattar in Madura indicates the profession of a priest in the temple. Who Tirumalayya Pillai was, there is no evidence. It is not suggested that this Tirumalayya Pillai had anything to do with the Thiruvaduthurai Mutt. He could not have been one of the Thambirans who were in Madura. However there is no doubt that one of the donees was a Brahmin and this, as I said before, is in accordance with the usage in this behalf and in accordance with what Mr. Hurdis says in Exhibit A. My conclusion is that there is not only no evidence to show that the original grant was made to the Adhinam for the purpose of conducting the Kattalai in the temple, but that there is positive evidence that it was made to two persons one of whom was a Brahmin, who must have been the Chief priest of the temple at the time of the grant.

I shall now refer to the subsequent history of this Kattalai. Vijia Chockanatha ruled over the Karnatic until 1731. His wife, as guardian of his minor son, was in possession of it till 1735 or 1736. About that time the Muhammadan Rulers seized the districts of Trichinopoly and Madura. As Mr. Hurdis points out (and Mr. Nelson supports him), the Muhammadan Rulers confiscated all endowments belonging to the temple in these districts. In 1790 the Madras Government assumed possession of the Madura District, because the Nabob of the Karnatic was not able to contribute his share of the expenses of the alliance with the Company; and they appointed Mr. Mcleod to manage the district. As is pointed out in the Gazetteer (pages 68—70), Mr. Mcleod was content with receiving the profits from the renters of the district. Finally, in the year 1801 by a treaty between the Nabob of the Karnatic and the East India Company the District came into the hands of the East India Company, and the first Collector of Madura was Mr. Hurdis. After he took charge, he submitted a number of reports of which we have only Exhibit A before us. It is stated in the Gazetteer that the Board ordered the Collector to restore to the temples the lands resumed from the Pagodas, but for some reason not now traceable Mr. Hurdis never carried out these instructions; and the Devastanam lands remained in the hands of the Government until 1841. In 1842, in pursuance of the policy of the Government to divest themselves of all connection with Indian religious institutions, the Devastanam properties were handed over to a Manager appointed by Government. I am of opinion that the Brahmin priest or Church Brahmin, as Mr. Hurdis calls him, was in possession of the property until he was deprived of it during the Muhammadan invasion in or about the year 1736, that from 1736 to 1790 the Muhammadan Rulers enjoyed the rents and profits, and that finally in 1801 the villages came into the possession of the East India Company. From this date there is no doubt that even, though the possession of the villages was with the Government till 1842, their income was utilised for temple purposes. From 1842 onwards, the general Manager of the temple was placed in possession of these villages.

I may here refer to two documents which have to a great extent influenced my decision in this case, and they are Exhibits V and V*a*. Exhibit V is an extract from the account relating to the Minakshy temple, Arakattalai, prepared for the jamabandi. It is dated 1802, shortly after Mr. Hurdis took charge of the district. It gives the name of Thanappa Mudaly as the donor and under the heading "person who is Kattalai Vicharanai," the names given are Nallaperumal Pillai and Ponnambala Pillai. Under the column "property security, personal security," the entry is, "Village Panaiyur, Veerabhadra Pillai; Village Iravatanallar, Muthu Pillai". Now, this document whose authenticity is beyond question gives the names of the above two individuals as being the Kattalai Vicharanaidars, that is the Managers of the Kattalai. It is not pretended that these two persons were the agents of the plaintiff. A feeble suggestion was made that they might have been the agents of the local Tambiran. If that were so, it is inconceivable that the agents of the Tambirans would have been entered as Vicharanaidars when the Tambirans themselves were on the spot. In the next place, these two persons had to find security for the management of the Kattalai. Veerabhadra Pillai of one village and Muthu Pillai of another village stood sureties for the management. If the Tambirans were the actual managers, it is unbelievable that they would not have come forward at least to stand surety for their servants. The only conclusion I can draw from this document is that in the year 1802 Mr. Hurdis appointed these two persons to be the Managers of the Kattalai and asked them to find sureties for their proper management. If any person had any hereditary right at this period, he would certainly have been mentioned in this document. In the next document, Exhibit V*a*, which is with reference to another village, Vilangudi (which is even now in the possession of the plaintiff), the name of the pattadar is entered as Nallaperumal Pillai. To my mind, these two documents are almost conclusive evidence that until the year 1802 the plaintiff or his predecessors-in-title had no right whatsoever to the management of this Kattalai. How they got in and under what circumstances, I shall mention later on. But these documents, which are of the same period as the entry of the British Government into possession of the district, are the strongest pieces of evidence against the claim of the plaintiff for a hereditary trusteeship in respect of the Kattalai. If they had acquired any such trusteeship, it must have been subsequent to 1802.

I shall now trace the connection of the plaintiff's Mutt with the management of this Kattalai. It was in the year 1814 for the first time that we hear of a Tiruvaduthurai Tambiran as being in charge of this Kattalai. Exhibit E is an extract from the register of accounts relating to Kattalais. It was compiled in Fasli 1224 corresponding to 1814. In the column, "purpose for which the Inam was granted and in whose charge"

there are two entries: (a) "to the temple of Minakshy Sundareswara at Madura;" (b) "for Devastanam Oochakala Kattalai in charge of Manickavachaga Tambiran". Under the column "by whom was the inam granted," the name of Thanappa Mudaly appears. In this document there is absolutely no reference to any hereditary right in Manickavachaga Tambiran. Manickavachaga Tambiran was admittedly the agent of the plaintiff's Mutt in Madura and he remained in the district from 1814 to 1833. I do not attach any importance to the fact that in Exhibit F, a copy of the above extract sent to the Board of Revenue, the name of Manickavachaga Tambiran does not appear. It was probably not necessary to communicate to the Board of Revenue the fact of the existence of a person who was a mere Manager; but if Manickavachaga had any hereditary right that would have undoubtedly been mentioned in Exhibit E, and it would be a significant omission in Exhibit F, the copy which was sent to the Board. Therefore, on the very first occasion that we hear of a Tambiran's connection with this temple, he is simply referred to as being in charge of the Kattalai.

Then we come to Exhibit G which was prepared in October 1817. It is an account of the budget allotment for the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai. In giving the names of the persons to whom salaries were paid, under the heading "establishment," the very first entry is Vicharanai (i. e., manager), Manickavachaga Tambiran; and his pay is entered as 3 pons, equivalent to Rs. $4\frac{1}{2}$. I cannot believe that if a person had a hereditary right to theloffice of the Trustee, he would have been mentioned under the heading "establishment," and as having been paid a salary of Rs. $4\frac{1}{2}$ a month. It has to be remembered that the other persons who are mentioned in this document are the Monigar who is given the same pay as the Manager, the Kanakkan whose pay is slightly less, the Paricharakan who is paid Rs. $1\frac{1}{2}$, the Purohit (who performs Rudra Japam) who is paid one rupee, and so on. Therefore, in the year 1814 we find a Tambiran of the plaintiff's Mutt entered as being a paid Manager of this Kattalai. Then, we go to Exhibit G2 which is for fasli 1226 corresponding to 1816. In the budget for that year, under the heading "establishment" Manickavachaga Tambiran figures as the first of the paid servants and his pay is again entered as 3 pons or Rs. $4\frac{1}{2}$. Then we come to Exhibits H6 and H7 which are for the year 1819 and under the heading "name of the donor," the entry is, "granted by Thanappa Mudali, superintended by Manickavachaga Tambiran." Here again, there is no reference to any right of trusteeship as pertaining to the plaintiff's Mutt. These documents are very important. I have already referred to the entry in Exhibit H7, which shows that the original grant was made to a Brahmin and a Pillai. Exhibit H6 is an account of all the endowments of the Pagodas and contains the names of the persons who were managing them. Tirumal Nayick's Kattalai, which comprises more villages than Thanappa Mudali's, has a paid Manager; a large number of similar endowments are also mentioned, each one of them being managed by a paid servant. It is in evidence that all these properties excepting those endowed by one Tirugura Sambanda Swami, are now in the possession of the temple, and no one has ever put forward any claim to them as being hereditary hukdars. Then we come to Exhibit J; this belongs to the year 1821. This is a notice issued by the Collector to Manickavachaga. Therein he is referred to as being attached to the Tiruvaduthurai Mutt. It was suggested that the language of this document indicates that the Kattalai itself was attached to the Tiruvaduthurai Muttam. I have looked into the original and I am satisfied that it is not so. Exhibit J is a notice issued by the Collector and the descriptive title of being attached to the Tiruvaduthurai Muttam cannot be construed as indicating that the Kattalai itself was attached to the plaintiff's Mutt. The document certainly does not say that this Manickavachaga was a hukdar of the Kattallai. A similar description of this Manickavachaga is to be found in Exhibit II with reference to another village, Kulipatti, which is still in the possession of the plaintiff and about which I shall have to say a few words later on. One cannot attach any importance to notices of this kind sent by the Revenue Authorities, wherein a casual reference is made to the addressee as being attached to a particular Muttam. The word hukdar for the first time appears in Exhibit G1 of the year 1834. There was some argument about the date of this document, but a reference to Exhibit VIII*f* puts it beyond doubt that this document was prepared in the year 1834. This is an account of the budget prepared in that year. The entry very much relied on is, "Beriz of Kudipatti, etc., through the hukdar." This Kudipatti was in the possession of the plaintiff's agents in Madura. There is no doubt, therefore, that the reference to "hukdar" is a reference to the plaintiff's agent. It is this word "hukdar" which was first used in this year that has been given an importance and a meaning which undoubtedly it does not deserve and which has enabled the plaintiff to put forward his present claim. But Exhibit G1, in giving details of the budget under the heading "Sibbandi" or establishment, puts Manickavachaga Tambiran at the head of the list and gives him a salary of 4 pons or Rs. 6. If he was hukdar in the sense in which that term is now sought to be employed, is it likely that he would have received a salary for doing the honorary duties of a Trustee? The document at the end of it, moreover, says: "Disburse pay to the above-mentioned persons after taking work from them." This does not read as if Manickavachaga was anything but a paid servant.

The other documents, which I do not think it necessary to refer to in detail, are Exhibits II, VII, VII*a*, VIII*b*. They all refer to the Tambiran at Madura as the Superintendent of the Kattalai. Then we have Exhibits M1, M2, M3, M4, which relate to the period when Manickavachaga was succeeded by Namasivaya Tambiran. Exhibit M1 is important, as being the first occasion when a reference is made to the Pandarasannadhi of Tiruvadurthurai. The document says, "that the arzi written to our office on the 3rd February current from Pandarasannadhi stating he has appointed and sent Namasivaya for the Vicharanai of the Meenakshy Temple at Madura was received." It was argued by Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar that, unless there was an hereditary right to the Vicharanai of this Kattalai, the Pandarasannadhi of Tiruvaduthurai would not have appointed an agent and intimated the name to the Revenue Authorities in Madura. It has to be remembered that the Tiruvaduthurai Mutt is a religious institution of great sanctity and importance to the non-Brahmins of Southern India. It has extensive properties in almost all the Tamil Districts and, as is customary with such religious institutions it has branches in every important religious centre for the purpose of giving religious instructions to the disciples of the Mutt. And, it is in consequence of this position of the Mutt that agents were from time to time appointed and placed in charge of the Mutt at the sacred city of Madura. I feel no doubt that it was in consequence of the sanctity of the local agent and having regard to the fact that he had a large number of disciples to whom he was giving religious instruction, that originally the Government requested him to be in charge of this Kattalai. As to when the branch of the Mutt of the Tiruvaduthurai Athinam was established in Madura, there is some little doubt. It is said that the grandson of the original Tanappa Mudali built a Mutt in Madura for the residence of the agent. A stone inscription has been exhibited in this case, Exhibit (AJ), which says that it was a gift by this grandson to the Tiruvaduthurai Adhinam. Therefore, the fact that in Exhibit M1 the head of the Tiruvaduthurai Mutt intimated to the Revenue Authorities that he had appointed a local agent is not evidence that the Tiruvaduthurai Mutt had hereditary title to this Kattalai. It is in the natural course of events that the Collector of the district should have looked to the head of the Mutt at Tanjore to send a proper person to manage the affairs of this Kattalai. Exhibit M4 is apparently the order of appointment from the Tahsildar to this Namasivaya Tambiran. It says, "we have ordered you should look after the management in the place of the deceased. You should, therefore, conduct the said Kattalai accordingly." If by the nomination of the Pandarasannadhi a right to the Kattalai trusteeship ipso facto accrued to the nominee, how is this to be accounted for that before the nominee could discharge his duties, he had to receive the orders of the Revenue Authorities for that purpose?

In Exhibit VIII*f* which is also of the year 1834, the Manager of the Devastanam writes to the Collector recommending that there should be an increase in the pay of the Vicharanai of the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai. He points out that the Manager of the Thirumalai Naick's Kattalai gets 20 pons, and that it is reasonable that the Manager of the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai should have an increase. There is no mention of hukdar in this document. In Exhibit VIII*g* dated the 16th July 1835, the increase of pay is sanctioned; the entry is, "enter in the accounts pay 8 pons a month for him and forward acquittance roll from the 1st August disbursing to him that salary regularly." In Exhibit VIII*h*, a letter written by Namasivaya Tambiran to the Collector, he says: "I succeeded to the post of hukdar of the said Kattalai from the Tiruvaduthurai Adhinam. You referred the matter as to my appointment to the Collector of Tanjore District; the authorities of the Tiruvaduthurai Adhinam, therefore, gave deposition before the Tahsildar of Kuttalam Taluq in favour of my being appointed to the place and an order of my appointment was passed on the 25th April 1834..... .....I had been looking after the duties of hukdar of the said Kattalai. I am entitled to pay for the said period, namely 16 pons I request the orders of the investigating peishkar to the said amount in my charge being debited to the jamakarchu account and allowed to me." The Collector endorses upon it: "It appears that you did not do the work of Superintendent of the said Kattalai for four months and five days from the date of the death of the late Superintendent to the date of your appointment. Hence there is no need for orders to disburse to you the pay for that period." It is curious that although Namasivaya styles himself as the hukdar of the Kattalai, the Collector simply calls him the Superintendent of the Kattalai. It is clear that in the years 1834 and 1835 the term hukdar was used as convertible with the term Vicharanai or Superintendent. Thus from the year 1802 to 1835 we hear of the local agents of the Mutt being employed as Superintendents of the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai: they start on a pay of 3 pons; their pay is increased to 8 pons; they call themselves Superintendents at first and subsequently assume the ambitious title of hukdar; they are placed at the head of the establishment of the servants of the Kattalai; the peishkar is directed to get work from them; their pay is stopped for the days that they absent themselves from work. Their duties are defined in Exhibit VIII*f* in these terms: "To take the necessary care in bringing to this place the emoluments from the villages for the purpose of administering the charity attached to the Kattalai; to visit the temple every day and night and exact the temple work without delay from the servants attached to the Kattalai; to see that Padi Kattalai, etc., go on properly and in time to the above Kattalai, and the duty devolves upon the incumbent also to attend with patience and care to all the other duties pertaining to the above Kattalai." These duties are more like those of a paid servant than those of a hereditary office-holder.

Before I leave this period, I shall refer to some documents on which reliance was placed for the appellant. In Exhibit D series after referring to the villages one by one, there is a remark to the effect that the balance was paid to the inamdar after deducting the "poruppu" upon the village. It was contended that the reference to the inamdar in these documents was to the plaintiff. It has to be remembered that prior to these documents there is no reference to the plaintiff as inamdar anywhere. In Exhibit C it is stated that the five villages are the absolute inam villages of the temple of "Meenakshy Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai." Reading Exhibit C and Exhibit D it seems to me that the term inamdar applies to the idol, and not to the plaintiff who was never before spoken of as the inamdar.

Another point which was pressed was that the Tasdik amount was paid to the plaintiff and that that indicates a hereditary right in the plaintiff to spend the income of the village. The evidence upon the question of the payment of the budget amount is very meagre. There is some support to the suggestion made by the plaintiff, in Exhibit N series and also in Exhibit XX. From the stray references to the disbursements of the budget by the Tambiran one can hardly come to a conclusion that as a matter of right the amounts budgeted for were given to the Tambiran for expending them on the Kattalai. But, granting for a moment that in some years the budget amount was in the hands of the Superintendent for expenditure in the temple, it does not follow that it was entrusted to him as a Trustee. It has to be remembered that the Tambirans were in possession of other villages whose income had been dedicated to this Kattalai and it was only natural that the Government, when they managed the endowment, and the Manager, when he was in charge of the general supervision of the temple, should have given the income from these five villages to the Tambiran, who had other incomes in his hands, for the purpose of expending both together for the Kattalai. To my mind, the evidence only leads to the conclusion that the Tambiran when he was Superintendent was consulted in the preparation of the budget: but that would not amount to a recognition of his right as Trustee of the Kattalai.

Much stress was laid upon the fact that the Tambiran was and is still in possession of certain other villages whose income admittedly is being spent upon the Thanappa Mudali's Kattalai. It has first to be remembered that there is no evidence as to when these other villages came to the possession of the Tambirans. The original contention of the plaintiff that they formed part of the same endowment, is absolutely untenable. Exhibit C of the year 1809 refers only to the five villages as forming the Kattalai. Exhibit D series also refers only to those five villages. Exhibit E, a statement prepared to be sent to the Board of Revenue, does not refer to any village other than the five as forming the Kattalai. Exhibit F is to the same effect. Exhibit VII is decisive of the question. It is an extract from the register of Takids sent to the Tahsildar by the Collector in the year 1827. It says: "Apart from the villages entered in the Tasdik for Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai for Minakshy Sundareswara Madura, there are four other villages for the Kattalai, two in the Karur Taluq, one Kulipatti, and so on." This shows beyond doubt that the original endowment consisted only of the five villages to which reference is made in numerous documents, and that the other villages were not part of the original endowment. As I said before, there is no evidence as to when the other villages came into the possession of the Tambirans and under what circumstances. The decision must depend upon probabilities; but there are certain undisputed facts which would show that these other villages came into the possession of the Tambirans long after the original grant. Exhibit AJ is a stone inscription to be found in the Tiruvaduthurai Muttam, which was a gift "to Namasivaya by one Chockalinga, Mudaliar, who was the son of Koneri Mudaliar and who was the son of Thanappa Mudaliar." The date of this document is not given anywhere, but it must have been two generations after the death of the original founder, Thanappa Mudaliar. We may take it, it was about the end of the 18th century. If the Mutt was founded about that time, it was only natural that the disciples of the Mutt should make grants for the performance of the puja in the temple and should make that gift through their religious preceptor who was then in Madura, and as the Oochakala service and Ardajama service are very important rituals in the temple, devotees would have been anxious to supplement the funds of that Kattalai by making grants. This probably accounts for the Tambirans being subsequently appointed Managers of the original endowment. Moreover the fact that these grants consisted of small portions of property in scattered villages is an indication that there was a large number of donors and that they did not come from a common source. As regards Kulipatti the position is somewhat different. It was an inam village in the Saptur zemindari. There was litigation concerning it its income which was granted either by the zemindar or by some other person was not being utilised by the Tambirans for Thanappa Mudaly's Kattalai; complaints were presented by the zemindar to the Collector that the income was being misspent. Ultimately there was a suit which resulted in a compromise between the Tambiran and the zemindari by which the income was permanently secured for the purposes of the Kattalai. It is very likely that the grant was anterior to the year 1811, because the subsequent compromise speaks of a previous one in that year. My conclusion is that these other villages including Kulipatti were granted to the agents of the Tiruvaduthurai Mutt who were in Madura, having regard to the fact that they were men of sanctity and in the hope that they would supplement the income from the original villages for the purposes of the sacred pujas at midday and at midnight. The possession of these villages is no indication that the plaintiff was the hukdar in reference to the original five villages. On the other hand, the fact that they never had possession of these five villages, while they were in possession of the other villages, shows that they were only paid Managers with reference to the former.

I must now deal with the document on which the plaintiff's case practically rests (Exhibit B1). Mr. Rangachariar objected to the admissibility of this document on various grounds. I do not think the document comes under section 35 of the Evidence Act. It is not an entry made by any public officer and as pointed out in Saraswati Dasi v. Dhanput Singh (3) unless the facts mentioned are within the personal knowledge of the public officer recording it, section 35 will have no application. The decision of the Privy Council in Rajah Muttu Ramalinga Setupati v. Perianayagum Pillay, (4) would seem to show that documents of this description are not public documents. But I think the document is admissible under section 13. There is an assertion of certain rights in it and the plaintiff is entitled to rely on it to show that so long ago as 1856 the rights now claimed were asserted. I am also inclined to think that it can come in under section 32, clause 4. There is no doubt about its genuineness, whatever may be the value to be attached to it. It comes from proper custody and in a case of this great magnitude, it is desirable to have the document on record unless it is shown clearly that it is inadmissible. I, therefore, proceed on the footing that Exhibit B1 is admissible in evidence. I must now consider its probative value.

The Collector sent an arzi to the peishkar of the Madura Devastanam on the 18th November 1836 asking him for particulars regarding the Thanappa Mudaly Kattalai. He asked for the name of the person who founded the Kattalai, the name of the present hukdar, the name of the person who collected the money, the name of the person who received and expended the Paditharam, the name of the person to whom accounts were rendered, etc. The peishkar asked Namasivaya, who was then Superintendent of the Kattalai, to furnish the requisite information; Exhibit B1 was the result of this request. In order to estimate the true value of this document we will have to look to the credentials of the person who made it. Until 1834 Manickavachaga Tambiran was the Superintendent of this Kattalai. Therefore, Namasivaya was in office only for two years when this information was asked of him. During the two years his conduct of the management was not above suspicion. On the 20th September 1836 we find the Collector finding fault with him for not having given a proper account of the articles purchased for the Kattalai and for having retained in his hands certain moneys without accounting for them, that is, Exhibit VIII*m*. Then we find in Exhibit VIII*n* in November 1836 the Collector stating that other articles purchased were not paid for and that Namasivaya was using the money for purposes of lending it to third parties. The peishkar was asked to get an explanation from Namasivaya. In Exhibit VIII*o* Namasivaya tried to put the blame upon the Monigar and the Karnam. In Exhibit VIII*p* the Moniam Gumasta said that it was Namasivaya that was responsible for the misuse of the funds. There was in consequence an inquiry into the conduct of Namasivaya with reference to his management of the funds of the Kattalai. It was at this time that Exhibit B1 was sent by Namasivaya Tambiran. It is dated the 11th January 1837. It would not be an unreasonable presumption to make that Namasivaya was anxious to screen himself from the scrutiny which was instituted against him by pleading that he had a hereditary right to the villages endowed for the Kattalai.

Let us examine the document itself to see whether the recitals in it are reliable. It says that the founder built a Mutt for the Tiruvaduthurai Adhinam at the time of the grant. We know from Exhibit A*j* that the Muttam did not come into existence until the time of Thanappa's grandson. Then, the document says that in addition to the five villages other villages, including Kulipatti, were granted by Thanappa Mudaly. I have shown already that the original grant consisted only of five villages and that the other villages were subsequent accretions to the Kattalai. The statement proceeds to say that Thanappa Mudali built a Mantapam and Arakattalai within the Prakaram ; there is absolutely no evidence of any such construction. Then it says that the grant was made in 1704. The Madura Manual, to which I have frequently referred, shows that Vijia Chockanatha was a minor until the year 1705 and that the Kingdom was being managed for him by Mangammal. It is incredible that any grant would have been made by this young boy at a time when such a masterful person as Mangammal was in charge of the Kingdom. And it is also belied by Exhibit H7, which shows that the grant must have been made in the year 1725. It is next stated in Exhibit B1 that Thanappa Mudaly made the grant to Velappa Pandaram at Tiruvaduthurai Adhinam. As to who this Velappa Pandaram was, there is no evidence. If he was the head of the Tiruvaduthurai Mutt at the time of the grant, he would not have been referred to by a Kattalai Tambiran as Velappa Pandaram at the Adhinam ; the plaintiff could have easily produced the genealogical tree showing the names of the various Pandarasannadhis and the dates of their accession from the records of the Mutt ; that has not been done. It is further in evidence that if a donation is made to the Mutt, it is always made in the name of Namasivaya who was the founder of the Adhinam. (See Exhibit A*j*.) Then we have a curious statement in the document that in the year 1794 Ponnambala Tambiran, the then Manager of the Kattalai, entrusted the management of its properties to the Nabob's Government and that accounts were being rendered to the Tambiran. There is absolutely no record anywhere of such an entrustment and of accounts having been rendered. Lower down there is a reference in this statement to Mr. Hurdis having sent for Manickavachaga Tambiran and having investigated the mamool regarding the endowment. This is not borne out by what Mr. Hurdis says in Exhibit A. It was argued that Namasivaya would not have made such a bold statement regarding a Collector unless it was true. If any action was taken directly on this document and if the statement was found to be untrue, a note of it would have been made by the Revenue Authorities: but if a deponent chose to make a statement which did not immediately affect the position of the Government, it is not to be expected that they would have taken the trouble of noting against the statement its falsity. The statement proceeds to says : "As it was not possible for us to make bandobast for the collection of the Aiveji of the said villages, it was accordingly requested that they should be kept under the attachment by the Circar and the amounts collected, etc." This is pure fiction : there is not a scrap of paper or any other evidence to support this statement. Lastly, the document ends by saying that the records, etc., were lost during the invasions. It seems to me that Namasivaya was drawing largely on imagination, partly for the purpose of saving himself from trouble which was impending regarding his mismanagement of the properties in his possession and partly to give himself an importance, which he did not possess, in the eyes of the Revenue Officials. I am unable to attach any weight to the statements, contained in this document unless they are corroborated in material particulars by other unimpeachable evidence. I may here refer to two documents which do not belong to this period, but which have a bearing on the statements contained in Exhibit B1.

In Exhibit XVII Kandasawmi Mudali, the grandson of Thana Koneri Mudali of Madura, writing on the 24th July 1857 protested against the use of the word hukdar by the Tambirans who were managing the Kattalai. Exhibit XVII*a* of September 1857 is also to the same effect. If the original grant was made to the Adhinam and if it had been the hukdar for over a century, it is incredible that the descendants of the grantor would have protested against the use of the word hukdar by the Adhinam, especially as the Tambirans were the religious preceptors of the community to which the writer of these documents belonged. It seems to me that we have before us an example of the assumption, in the first instance, of a designation which was innocuous at the commencement but to which subsequently an endeavour is being made to attach privileges and claims which were not originally contemplated.

I have now traced the history of the Kattalai down to 1837 when the statement of Namasivaya was given. I shall very briefly pass over the remaining period, because it is not of any special significance except on the question of limitation. Nothing important happened between the years 1837 and 1840. In 1841, the Government resolved to divest themselves of responsibility for the management of Devastanams throughout the whole of the Madras Presidency. In Exhibit N1, dated the 6th October 1841, the Collector submitted to the Secretary to the Board of Revenue his proposals for the transfer of possession of Devastanam properties from Government to some persons who can be entrusted with the management of their affairs. Then follows Exhibit N2, which is a letter from the Board to the Government sending up the recommendations of the Collector. Exhibit N3 is an extract from a letter from the Court of Directors dealing with the recommendations of the Madras Government. Exhibit N4 is from the Secretary to the Government of India to the Chief Secretary to the Madras Government. As a result of this correspondence, in 1842 one Muthuchella Thevan, who was the Dewan of the Ramnad zemindari, was appointed manager of the Devastanam (see Exhibit M7). He was the Trustee of the temple without any hereditary right thereto. That he took possession of the property including the Kattalai is not disputed. Some protest must have been made at this time regarding possession, because we find that in the Exhibit O series final orders were passed in the year 1849 to the effect that possession must be in the General Manager and not in the Superintendent of the Kattalai. This is what Exhibit O3 says : "In the meantime some parties in whose names the Kattalais themselves are entered prefer a claim to possession instead of the Managers of the Devastanams, and Mr. Parker solicits instructions as to whether their wish should be complied with. The Board are of opinion that it may be productive of inconvenience if the administration of the institutions and of their endowments were entrusted to different hands. As a general rule, therefore, the Devastanam villages, whether Sarva inam or subject to jodi, should be made over to the Managers of the institutions to which they appertain, but should there be any special occasion, the claims of the parties in whose names the Kattalais are entered (by which the Board presume is meant the descendants of the parties by whom the endowments were made) seem to merit particular consideration. The Collector should report such instances for further orders." According to this document, notwithstanding the claims of the Superintendents for possession of the Kattalai properties, the Government deliberately put the General Manager in possession of them. It is important to note that from 1849, notwithstanding the saving clause which enabled persons who had any right to independent possession to come forward and to convince the Collector of their rights, none of the Tambirans had put forward a hereditary right to the possession of the villages. If we contrast this attitude with that of the disciples of one Gnanasambanda Pandaram, who founded a Kattalai and who claimed independent possession as against the Manager and succeeded in establishing it, there can be no doubt that the Tambirans never had or believed they had a hereditary right to possession as Trustees of the Kattalai. After 1849 there were a number of General Managers or Trustees who managed the temple properties including the Kattalai villages. It is only necessary to point out that the persons who were appointed in 1842 and who remained in possession after 1849 were really the Trustees of the temple—See Exhibit N7. Then Act XX of 1863 was passed and under it a Committee was appointed for this temple; the Committee appointed Managers for this Devasthanam from time to time in the same way as the Government did. It is true in some years the Committee was directly in possession of the temple villages. Their possession must be taken to have been as de facto Trustees. Anyhow from the year 1842 when the Government handed over management to the person whom they appointed as Trustee or General Manager of the temple and when in the year 1849 they definitely refused to recognise the right of the Superintendents of the Kattalais to be in possession, the temple Trustee's possession was not on behalf of the plaintiff or with his permission.

There is only one other aspect of the case to be considered before I deal with the question of limitation. It is well-settled that if there is no evidence regarding the devolution of management at the time of grant, the usage of the institution must be the guide. This was laid down in Nilakandan v. Padmanabha (5) and Nilakandhen Nambudirapad v. Padmanabha Ravi Varma (6).

What has been the course of management in this institution? As I pointed out more than once, there is no evidence that the founder prescribed any particular mode of devolution. From 1735 to 1800, possession was in the hands of persons who did not recognise the right of the founder of the Kattalai or even of the temple. From 1800 the Superintendents of the Kattalai were not in actual physical possession of the villages. We find that the Superintendent was a salaried officer. There is evidence that as regards dignities, the General Manager took precedence over the Kattalai Manager. We find that the funds of the villages were used, not only for the purpose of the particular Kattalai, but for the general purposes of the temple, such as sanitation, keeping of a garden (Exhibit AA6), general repairs (Exhibits G and G1), lighting (Exhibits XXXIV*az* and XXXIV*d*), employing watchmen (Exhibits XXXIV and XXXIV*h*), Court expenses (Exhibit AA10), repairing of vehicles and so on—thus showing that the income was regarded as part of the Devastanam endowment. From these facts it is clear that the usage of the institution does not show any right in the Superintendents of the Kattalai, whether they called themselves hukdars or not, to remain in possession of the villages appertaining to the Kattalai or to receive the income of the villages themselves; on the other hand, the usage indicates that the General Manager of the temple was regarded as the person entitled to possession and management. My conclusion on the facts is that the plaintiff has not established his right to be Trustee of the Kattalai.

I do not attach much weight to the circumstances pointed out by the District Judge in paragraphs 35 and 36 of his judgment They, no doubt, show that the Government scrutinised the minutest details of the management of the Kattalai. The regret is that such supervision and control ceased in 1842. Till then, the Government regarded themselves as being in the position of the ancient Sovereigns of India. These latter managed the Devastanams directly, as is being done to-day in Mysore and Travancore. The documents referred to by the District Judge show that the Government thought it was their duty to see that the income from the endowments was scrupulously applied towards the expenses of the Devasthanam. The acts of interference were not in derogation of hereditary rights, if any there were, but in furtherance of the right of over-lordship which was inherited from the Ruling Chiefs of India: Venkatabalakrishna Chettiyar v. Kaliyanaramaiyangar (7) shows that similar acts of supervision were not to be considered as depriving of their hereditary right the persons entitled to it.

Upon my finding on the facts the question of law does not arise, but I should like to give my decision upon that question also, having regard to the fact that the learned Chief Justice is inclined to take a different view of the facts. The question of law may be looked at from two positions—one as affecting prescription, the other limitation. Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar contended that as the plaintiff through his agent, the Tambiran, was in possession of part of the properties of the endowment and had also performed part of the functions of the office appertaining to the hukdarship of the Kattalai, there could be no adverse possession. The contention of the learned Vakil is that a Trustee can be totally deprived of his rights by another, but there cannot be a partial deprivation of the functions of the office and a partial acquisition of rights appertaining to that office. Neither he nor Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar who argued this point in repl y quoted any authority for this position. They said that they were unable to find direct authority, and one may take it that what the learned Vakils were unable to find, does not exist. I am unable to say that such a right cannot be acquired by prescription. In the case of a landlord, it is now well-established that although he may be in receipt of rents, a person can prescribe as against him the limited rights of a tenant [Vide Thakore Fatesinghji v. Bamanji A. Dalal (8); Icharan Singh v. Nilmony Balidar (9); Subbayya v. Madduletiah (10)]. This amounts to a partial deprivation of the right of the owner and a partial acquisition of that right by another; similarly other limited rights derogating from full ownership can be prescribed. In Subbaroya Chetty v. Aiyaswami Aiyar (11) it was decided that a widow's estate can be acquired by prescription. It has also been held that where a person who is the real owner of the property holds it in the belief that he is only a tenant, he will acquire a right to the property only as such tenant and that the right as owner can be acquired by another. [See Secretary of State for India v. Krishnamoni Gupta (12).] The ratio decidendi of these pronouncements is that the fact that a person is in possession of property is no obstacle to the acquisition of partial rights in it. Applying this principle, I fail to see why the hukdar of the Thanappa Mudali Kattalai could not be deprived of his right to possession whilst still retaining his right to the other dignities connected with the office, and why the General Manager and the Trustee of the temple is not entitled to acquire that possession adversely. Much reliance was placed upon the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Bhaiaji Thakur v. Jharula Das (13). In that case, the office of Panda was capable of being held only by a Brahmin. The co-owners of that office were in the habit of utilising the surplus funds for their own use. A right in this surplus fund was sold to a non-Brahmin, and he was in receipt of the income of the share sold to him. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held that the receipt of the income did not give a right to the office of Panda, because, they pointed out, that the office of Panda could not be acquired by such a person. I do not think that that case really helps the plaintiff. The judgment says: "The right to the office of shebait did not arise from, or depend upon, the receipt of a share of the surplus daily income from the offerings to the temple, although the right to receive daily a share of the net income from the offerings to the temple was attached to, and dependent on, the possession of the right to the shebaitship.....By adversely taking and appropriating to his own use a share of the surplus daily income from the offerings, Jharula Das acquired no title and no right to a share of that income.....; it did not constitute him the shebait for the time being or affect in any way the title to the office." This case only lays down that the receipt of the income from the office did not constitute the shebaitship. I do not think that that case is an authority for the position that an office cannot be split up and that a right to a portion of it cannot be acquired by prescription. The case in Gnanasambanda Pandara Sannadhi v. Velu Pandaram (14) only lays down that there is no distinction between the claim to the office and the claim to the property in regard to the application of Article 124. It does not follow from that that the claim to the property cannot be dissociated from the claim to the office. The decisions in Raghunatha Chariar v. Thiruvengada Ramanuja Chariar (15) and Kamalathammal v. Krishna Pillai(16) do not take the matter any further. The decision in Mulji Bhulabhai v. Manohar Ganesh (17) does not affect the present case. Apart from the observation that the right to the property inheres in the idol, which to a certain extent cannot be controverted, it is no authority for the position that there cannot be adverse possession with reference to the right of management of a trustee. On the other hand, we have the authority of Alagirisami Naickar v. Sundareswara Ayyar (18) which holds that a joint trusteeship can be acquired with another [see also Kannan v. Nilakandan (19); Pattaikara Mannakkal Kuppen v. Chvorakkapatti Munde Kotttil (20) and Jagan Nath Das v. Birbhadra Das (21)]. I am, therefore, of opinion that even thoug the hukdar was in possession of some of the properties and was performing some of the functions pertaining to the office, there is no principle or authority which compels us to hold that his other rights could not have been acquired by prescription against him. The quotation from Bacon's Abridgment regarding incompatibility does not apply to the present case. There is nothing incompatible in the Trustee of a temple holding possession of the villages which may rightly be claimed to belong to a subordinate Superintendent.

I think upon another ground, that of limitation, the plaintiff's suit fails. Mr. Rangachariar contended that the proper Article applicable was 142. Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar, on the other hand, argued that section 10 of the Limitation Act would apply, and that there was no bar of limitation. It has to be remembered that there is no complaint in this case (the contention relating to mismanagement and misapplication of funds were given up in the Court below) that the income of villages is not being utilised for the purpose of the Kattalai ; this is not a suit, therefore, by the plaintiff to recover the property for the Kattalai as against a trespasser, who claims it for himself. The profits of the property are being utilised for the purpose of the trust only ; the person who so utilises them is different from the person who claims a right to utilise them in that way. In such a case, if possession was lost more than 12 years before suit, the claim will be barred by limitation. In Balwant Rao v. Purun Mal (1) it is pointed out: "Here there is no question of recovering the property for the trusts of the endowment, because the defendant admits that he is a Trustee and says that he is applying the property to the trusts of the endowment. There is no evidence that he is not applying the property to the trusts of the endowment, and there is no reason to conclude that the property would be more applied to those trusts if the plaintiff were to succeed in his suit than it is at this moment. The plaintiff is suing only for his own personal right to manage or in some way to control the management of the endowment." The conclusion of the Judicial Committee was that the suit would be barred either by six or twelve years' limitation. The principle of the decision has been followed in Karimshah v. Nattan Bibi (22), in Nilakandan v. Padmanabha (5) and in Sankaran v. Krishna (23). In the present case, the claim of the plaintiff, at its best, only amounts to this. The first defendant who is the general Trustee is not entitled to manage the plaint villages and to apply the proceeds for the purposes of the Kattalai, but it is the plaintiff's prerogative to have the management in his own hands and to apply the income himself. The case is exactly covered by the dictum of the Privy Council already referred to and by the other cases following it. I, therefore, hold that even if the plaintiff be regarded as the hukdar of the Kattalai villages and as being entitled in his own right to their possession, inasmuch as the Government expressly vetoed his right in 1849 and handed over possession to the general Trustee of the temple, his right to recover possession arose in 1849 and he did not choose to bring the suit within 12 years of that period, his claim is barred by limitation.

I, therefore, agree with the learned Chief Justice upon the question of limitation and in his conclusion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Wajib-ul-arz showing muafi to be resumable, effect of —Muafi-khairati, interpretation of.

An entry in a Wajib-ul-arz showing a muafi to be resumable is no proof of the fact that the muafi is resumable, where the entry is not the record of a custom or practice ascertained after due inquiry, but merely the statement of a landlord in his own favour as that of an interested party.

The word muafi-khairati does not in itself imply that the muafi has an effect only during the pleasure of the grantor.

Appeal from the decree of the Officiating Commissioner, Fyzabad, dated 2nd May 1913, modifying the order of the Deputy Commissioner, Bara Banki, dated 29th August 1912, reversing that of the Assistant Collector, Bara Banki, dated 2nd July 1912.

Mr. Muhammad Faiq, for the Appellants.

Pandit Sarju Prasad Misra, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The claims made for the appellants are,—first, that the Wajib-ul-arz of the First Settlement shows the muafi to be resumable and, second, that as the land in question is muafi-khairati it is for that reason to be considered resumable. On both claims I think I must agree with the Commissioner. The Wajib-ul-arz was not a Wajib-ul-arz prepared to ascertain custom or practice after due enquiry. It was merely the statement in his own favour of an interested party. The word khairati, too, does not in itself imply that it has an effect only during the pleasure of the grantor. It is, in my opinion, not proved that this is a resumable grant and the order of the Commissioner is, therefore, upheld and the appeal dismissed with costs on the appellants.

Appeal dismissed.

Mortgage suit—Ex parte decree set aside—Suit on subsequent mortgage and decree against prior mortgagee —Proceedings in first suit re-opened—Subsequent mortgagee impleaded—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 18 —Priority not set up in subsequent suit—Res judicata —Civil Procedure Code(Act V of 1908), s. 11, *Expl. In a suit on a mortgage where a subsequent mortgagee was also impleaded in the name of his benamidar, an ex parte decree was passed, but the ex parte decree and also the sale held thereunder were set aside on the application of the mortgagors. Meanwhile the subsequent mortgagee brought a suit on his mortgage which was also decreed ex parte. The proceedings in the 1st suit having been re-opened, the subsequent mortgagee was made a party in his own name, but more than 12 years after the due date specified in the bond, and it was not disputed that prior to the proceedings the plaintiffs' cause of action against the real subsequent mortgagee was kept concealed from him:

Held, (1) that whether section 18 of the Limitation Act was applied or the view be taken that the mortgagee was on the record from the outset in the naem of his benamidar, the suit as against him was not barred by limitation; and

(2) that the plaintiffs having failed, in the suit on the subsequent mortgage, to which they were made parties, to set up their right of priority under their prior mortgage, they could not now set up that right and their suit was barred by Explanation IV to section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Appeal against the decree of the Sub-Judge, Khulna, dated 19th August 1911, modifying that of the Munsif, 3rd Court, Bagerhat, dated 30th August 1910.

Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak (with him Babu Bepin Chandra Ghose), for the Appellant.

Babus Jogesh Chandra Roy and Sarat Chandra Ghosh, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal was heard in part on the 28th and 30th January, but it being there found necessary to send for certain records the hearing could not be completed before the 1st of May.

It appears that on the 14th $\frac{\text{Baisakh 1301}}{\text{April 1894}}$ to secure an advance of Rs. 100, defendants Nos. 1 to 5 (the Malo defendants) executed a registered mortgage-bond in favour of one Nazir Sheikh, whose estate is now represented by the plaintiffs. It further appears that on the 11th $\frac{\text{Aghan 1303}}{\text{November 1896}}$ to secure a further advance of Rs. 200, the Malo defendants next executed a registered mortgage-bond in favour of three ladies, Hiramati Dasi (defendant No. 6), Rajlakhi Dasi and Matangini. Hiramati is the wife of Rajendra Kumar Ghosh, now defendant No. 7, Rajlakhi was the wife and is now the widow of Basanta Kumar Ghosh, whose estate is represented by Rajendra Kumar, and Matangini is the wife of Hemanta Kumar Ghosh, now defendant No. 8.

On the 12th April 1901 the plaintiffs brought their present suit to enforce the mortgage of Baisakh 1301 and in this suit they impleaded the mortgagors, the Malos, and also Hiramati as a subsequent mortgagee entitled to redeem. The suit was decreed ex parte on the 20th June 1901. The decree was made absolute on the 15th February 1902 and on the 29th July of that year, the mortgaged property was brought to sale and purchased by the plaintiffs, then decree-holders. On the 10th May 1909 the Malo defendants applied to have the ex parte decree and the sale set aside and on the 23rd of August of that year both applications were granted.

Meanwhile on the 7th of April 1909 Rajendra Kumar, for himself and as administrator to the estate of Basanta, and Hemanta Kumar brought a suit (No. 283 of 1909) to enforce the mortgage of Aghan 1303. They alleged that the ostensible mortgagees, Hiramati, Rajlakhi and Matangini, whom they made parties defendants, were merely their benamidars and that the sum advanced was taken from the joint funds of Rajendra, Basanta and Hemanta. They further impleaded the present plaintiffs and one Satu Bibi, a purchaser of the mortgaged properties. In that suit there was a decree ex parte against all the defendants on the 11th May 1909. This was followed on the 7th December of the same year by an order absolute, made also ex parte and apparently without the issue of notice to any of the judgment-debtors. On the 20th December 1909 an application was made by the present plaintiffs to have the ex parte decree set aside. This application was dismissed by the first Court on the 18th July 1910, and by the Appellate Court on the 3rd July 1911.

The present suit having been re-opened by the order of 23rd August 1909, defendant No. 5, Shib Ram, filed a written statement on the 17th September 1909. In accordance with the objections therein taken, on the 21st September 1909 Rajendra Kumar and Hemanta Kumar were made parties and in their written statement filed on the 29th November 1909 pleaded inter alia that the suit as against them was barred, first, by limitation and secondly, by the principle of res judicata by reason of the ex parte decree in Suit No. 283 of 1909 in which the present plaintiffs, being defendants, had failed to set up any prior lien.

The 1st Court negatived these and the other pleas of the defendants and decreed the suit of the plaintiffs. On appeal by Hiramati, Rajendra and Hemanta, the learned Subordinate Judge agreed with the first Court as regards the plea of res judicata, but taking the view that the three ladies, the ostensible mortgagees, were the benamidars each of her own husband, on the ground that Rajlakhi and Matangini had never been made parties and that Rajendra as administrator to the estate of Basanta and Hemanta had been impleaded more than 12 years after the due date of payment, dismissed the suit as against the estate of Basanta and as against Hemanta as barred by limitation.

Rajendra now appeals to this Court against the decree made against him personally. There is no appeal by Hiramati and there is no cross-appeal by the plaintiffs.

In the appeal, as in the Court below, the contentions of the appellants are (1), that the suit is barred by limitation and (2) that by reason of the decree in Suit No. 283 of 1909 the present suit is barred by the principle of res judicata.

It is not disputed that the appellant was brought on the record more than 12 years after the due date specified on the bond, and in support of the first contention, reliance is placed on section 22 of the Limitation Act (IX of 1908). But it is not disputed that prior to the proceedings of 1909 the plaintiffs' cause of action against Rajendra had been concealed from them. It follows that whether we apply section 18 of the Limitation Act, or take the view that Rajendra was on the record from the outset in the name of his benamidar Hiramati, the suit as against him is not barred by limitation.

The question raised by the second contention is perhaps not free from difficulty. The respondents rely upon the case of Surjiram v. Barhamdeo (1) and the case of Musammat Dhapi v. Barham Deo Pershad (2). But in so far as these cases support the contention of the respondents it must, I think, be taken that they have in effect been overruled and the principle laid down in Gopal Lal v. Banarasi Pershad(3) affirmed by the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Muhammad Ibrahim Hossein Khan v. Ambika Pershad Singh (4). The plaint, judgment and decree in Suit No. 283 of 1909 have been put in evidence and it is clear that the suit was not as stated by the Subordinate Judge, for the sale of the mortgaged property subject to all prior encumbrances. No doubt in the plaint the present plaintiffs are described as purchasers, their purchase in execution of their mortgage-decree having taken place prior to the institution of that suit, but they as well as the mortgagors were called upon to redeem. They should, therefore, have set up in that suit their right to priority under their prior mortgage and if they had done so successfully, the decree that has been made against them could not have been made. It would seem, therefore, that Explanation IV to section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies and that the plaintiffs cannot now set up their claim to priority.

The plaintiffs-respondents have then urged that they should be now given an opportunity of showing that all the proceedings in Suit No. 283 of 1909 as against them were fraudulent. It is suggested on their behalf that if they had been aware of the effect of the decree in that suit, they would have taken other and further steps to have the ex parte decree set aside. But of the effect sought to be given to that decree they were aware from the written statement filed on the 29th November 1909. Neither then nor when the evidence was taken in August 1910, after the dismissal of their application to have the sale set aside, did they seek to raise this issue. I am, therefore, unable to accede to the prayer for a remand.

In the result this appeal is decreed and the plaintiffs' suit as against the appellant is dismissed. Having regard to all the facts, I direct that as between the appellant and the plaintiffs parties bear their own costs throughout.

Appeal decreed.

Present:—Sir Henry Richards, KT., Chief Justice, and Justice Sir P. C. Banerji, KT.

GANGA PRASAD AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS —APPELLANTS

RAM PRASAD AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS —RESPONDENTS.

Jurisdiction—Suit for declaration between rival claimants to a tenancy—Jurisdiction of Civil or Revenue Court.

The plaintiffs, who were formerly members of a joint Hindu family with the defendants, sued for a declaration that they had some interest in an occupancy holding which belonged to the family. The defendants pleaded that the holding in question had been divided and that the plaintiffs had got consideration for the giving up of all interest therein:

Held, that the claim was one between rival claimants to the tenancy and as such was cognizable by a Civil Court.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Ghazipur, dated the 7th of August 1913.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Appellants.

Mr. M. L. Agarwala, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit in which the plaintiffs sought a declaration that they had certain rights in cultivatory holdings specified at the foot of the plaint. The facts up to a certain point seem to be undisputed by either side. It is admitted that at one time both the plaintiffs and the defendants were members of a joint Hindu family. In 1898 there was a partition of some property, but the zemindari and cultivatory holdings remained undivided. In the year 1907 the zemindari was divided. The plaintiffs allege that the cultivatory holdings still remained undivided and that the defendants had begun to lay claim to the whole of them to the exclusion of the plaintiffs. Hence they brought the present suit. The defendants raised a number of technical pleas but on the merits their defence was that the cultivatory holdings had also been divided and that the plaintiffs had got consideration for the giving up of all interest therein. This question on the merits has not been decided by the lower Appellate Court. The case in the first instance came before a Subordinate Judge, who seems to have considered that the relation between the parties in respect of the cultivatory holdings was a matter for the Revenue Court, and he accordingly directed the defendants to institute a suit in the Revenue Court. A suit was in fact instituted and the present defendants obtained a decree in their favour. (The Revenue Court, however, as we shall presently show, never decided the real question between the parties.) The present suit then came on for decision before another Subordinate Judge, who had succeeded the learned Subordinate Judge before whom the case came in the first instance. He considered that his predecessor ought not to have ordered any proceedings in the Revenue Court but ought to have decided the present case on its merits. He found that the plaintiffs were entitled to an interest in the cultivatory holdings, and accordingly decreed the plaintiffs' claim. On appeal the learned District Judge came to the conclusion that the finding of the Revenue Court was conclusive and that he was not entitled to go behind it.

The plaintiffs now come here in second appeal, contending that the decision of the District Judge was not correct. It is necessary that we should have clearly before our minds what was the nature of the plaintiffs' claim in the present suit. They claimed that they had an interest in these cultivatory holdings. Their claim was not as zemindars, or in any way based on the fact that they may have been, and probably are, zemindars of the villages in which these cultivatory holdings are situate. In other words, their claim in the present suit was a claim beween rival claimants to the cultivatory holdings, while the defendants allege that the plaintiffs gave up all claim to the cultivatory holdings for good consideration. A careful examination of the judgments both of the Assistant Collector and the Commissioner in the Revenue Court proceedings will clearly demonstrate that the Revenue Court never decided this question. True it is that the Revenue Court did decide that the plaintiffs were zemindars and that the defendants were tenants, but this was not denied. The Revenue Court also seems to have come to a decision as to what was the nature of the tenancy in the cultivatory holdings. Its finding on this question may no doubt be binding, but it has never decided whether or not the plaintiffs had an interest in the cultivatory holdings. Of course it may turn out that the plaintiffs' case is wrong and that the defendants' case is right. All that we decide in the present appeal is that the plaintiffs are entitled to have this question tried out. We allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and remand the case to that Court with directions to re-admit the appeal upon its original number in the file and to proceed to hear and determine the same according to law. The appellant will have his costs of this appeal including fees on the higher scale. Other costs will abide the result.

Appeal allowed; Case remanded.

RAMASAMI AIYAR v. SECRETARY OF STATE.

Levying of Kudimaramath dues—Payment under protest —Suit for recovery—Limitation—Madras Revenue Recovery Act (II of 1864), s. 59—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 16.

Steps taken to recover Kudimaramath dues under section 6 of Act I of 1858, are in effect proceedings under Act II of 1864, and a person aggrieved thereby must bring his suit for redress within six months from the date of the cause of action as provided by section 59 of Act II of 1864 and not within one year under Article 16 of the Limitation Act, 1908.

The phrase "proceedings under this Act" found in section 59 of Act II of 1864, has the same meaning as "means by which arrears of land revenue are recoverable" in section 6 of Act I of 1858.

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The plaintiffs are the appellants. The Secretary of State for India in Council is the defendant (respondent) in this second appeal. The only question in this case is whether the plaintiffs' suit for damages against the Government is barred by limitation.

The facts are as follows. The Collector of Trichinopoly believed that an old custom (now extinct, according to the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge) of demanding kudimaramath labour was still in force and demanded contribution of labour from the plaintiffs and on the plaintiffs' neglecting to so contribute labour, purported to act under Madras Act I of 1858, section 6, and proceeded to recover the value of the labour "by the same means by which arrears of land revenue are recovered." The Collector attached the plaintiffs' crops on 6th October 1908 according to the procedure prescribed in section 8 of the Madras Act II of 1864. Thereupon, the plaintiffs paid up the amount a few days after the attachment. The suit was brought on the 2nd September 1909, more than six months after the attachment of the crops and the payment of the sum for which the crops were attached, but within one year of the said dates. The question is whether limitation for the suit is one year under Article 16 of the Limitation Act (relating to suits against Government to recover money paid under protest in satisfaction of the claim made by the Revenue Authorities on account of arrears of revenue or on account of demands recoverable as such arrears) or whether it is six months, the period provided in section 59 of Act II of 1864 (for suits by parties deeming themselves aggrieved by any proceedings taken under Madras Act II of 1864). The lower Appellate Court has held that the special period of limitation provided in the provisions of section 59 of Act II of 1864 applied and dismissed the suit with costs. Hence this second appeal.

Now section 6 of Act I of 1858 says that the amount payable for kudimaramath dues may be recovered "by the same means" by which arrears of land revenue are recoverable. Arrears of land revenue were then recoverable under the provisions of Act XXIII of 1856 (an Act for the better recovery of arrears of revenue under Ryotwari Settlement in the Madras Presidency). That Act was repealed by Act XXXIX of 1858, which was again repealed by section 65 of Act II of 1864. Section 65 of Act II of 1864 was itself repealed by Act XII of 1873. But, of course, these repeals of later Acts and sections did not revive the repealed provisions of earlier Acts. (See section 8, clause (b), of the Madras General Clauses Act I of 1891.) The references in section 6 of Act I of 1858 to "the means by which arrears of land revenue are recoverable," if made to the provisions of Act XXXIX of 1858, must, by section 18 of the Madras General Clauses Act, be held now to be references to the provisions of Act II of 1864, which repealed Act XXXIX of 1858 but re-enacted most of the provisions of Act XXXIX of 1858. The Collector's action against the plaintiffs for recovery of the kudimaramath dues was, therefore, the adoption of "means" under Act II of 1864, which is the Act by whose "means" arrears of land revenue are now made recoverable.

The next question is whether the phrase "proceedings under this Act," found in section 59 of Act II of 1864, has the same meaning as "means by which arrears of land revenue are recoverable" in section 6 of Act I of 1858. If it has the same meaning, a person aggrieved by the adoption of "the means by which arrears of land revenue are recoverable" is, ipso facto, a person aggrieved by proceedings taken under Act II of 1864 and it seems to follow that he must bring his suit for redress within six months from the date of the course of action.

Mr. Srinivasagopalachari, the learned Counsel for the appellant, relied upon the cases decided under the provisions of the Madras Abkari Act, the Madras Local Boards Act, the Madras Income Tax Act and the Madras Agricultural Loans Act, in which cases it had been held that a sale of the defaulter's lands (for the recovery of moneys due to Government under those Acts) did not attract the provisions of section 42 of Act II of 1864, that is, did not give the purchaser under the said sale a title free of all encumbrances. The ratio decidendi for those decisions was thus stated in the earliest reported case, namely, the case in Ramachandra v. Pitchaikanni (1), decided by Sir Charles Turner, C. J., and Mr. Justice Muthusami Aiyar: "Section 3 of the Madras Act II of 1864 declares that the land, the buildings upon it, and its products shall be regarded as the security of the public revenue. Section 37 reserves to persons claiming an interest in the land power to save such interest by payment of the arrears. Section 42 declares that all lands brought to sale on account of arrears of revenue shall be sold free of all encumbrances. Taking these sections together, the intention is clear that the purchase is free of prior encumbrances only when the arrear is of public revenue, of which the land is the first security by statutory declaration. By section 10 of the Abkari Act, it is enacted that Collectors may proceed against Abkari renters or other persons licensed under that Act for the recovery of the arrears due by them in like manner as for the recovery of arrears of land revenue, and may further, at their discretion, take the farm under Government management at the risk of the renter, or may declare the lease forfeited, and re-sell the farm at the said renter's risk and loss. The question is:—Has section 42 been extended by section 52 to sales for arrears of Abkari revenue? We must certainly answer it in the negative. The expression, 'In like manner as for the recovery of arrears of land revenue,' indicates only that the same procedure is to be followed, and the language used in section 52 is to the same effect. Arrear of Abkari revenue is not due upon any specific land owned by the Abkari renter, and section 3 of Madras Act II of 1864 can have no application, and section 42, which must be construed in relation to it, cannot otherwise apply." The reason then by which the provisions of section 42 were held not to apply, namely, that those provisions were intended to apply only when the revenue sought to be recovered had been made the first charge upon the land, does not seem to apply when we have to consider the ambit of the provisions of section 59 of Act II of 1864, which deals with the limitation period applicable to a suit brought for redress on account of proceedings taken in accordance with the Act. This has been so held in several cases. In Orr v. Secretary of State for India in Council (2), Sir Arnold White, C. J., and Benson, J., held that even where a demand was made by the Collector, not for recovery of any revenue due to the Government, but for fees payable to the village servants and the demand was complied with under protest, a suit for the recovery of the money so paid should be brought within six months under section 59 of Act II of 1864 read with section 52 of that Act. The question whether a mere issue of a demand can be taken as a proceeding taken under the Act seems not to have been considered in that case. [See Ravula Vengala Reddi v. Secretary of State for India in Council (3). Also Ravala Nagama v. Secretary of State for India (4).] But in the present case, an actual attachment had been made and the question whether the mere issue or even service of a demand is a proceeding under the Act need not be further considered. In Sankarappa Naicken v. Secretary of State for India (5) it has been quite broadly decided that the special limitation of six months mentioned in section 59 of Act II of 1864 is applicable to a suit brought for any kind of redress, if the cause of action arose out of proceedings which were purported to be held in accordance with the provisions of Act II of 1864. That was a very extreme case in which the suit was brought, not only for recovery of the assessment levied but, for any injunction against the Government who had ordered the removal of certain steps and for a declaration that the site of those steps belonged to the plaintiff. And yet Benson and Munro, JJ., held that the suit even for the declaration and the injunction reliefs was barred because the penal assessment had been levied from the plaintiff in accordance with Act II of 1864, and these other reliefs (for declaration and injunction) were so connected with the grievance relating to the levy of the penal assessment that these other reliefs also came within the purview of section 59 of Act II of 1864. I think I am bound by the uniform course followed in this Court so far as the applicability of section 59 is concerned to such cases. No doubt, the cases in which this special rule of limitation has been made applicable are cases covered by section 52 of Madras Act II of 1864. But that special rule of limitation was applied, not because the sums sought to be recovered by the Government were sums referred to in another section found in the same Act II of 1864 in which section 59 is found, but because those sums were made recoverable in the same manner as if they were arrears of land revenue. On the whole then, though not without some hesitation (hesitation caused by the consideration that Article 16 of the Limitation Act also covers the case and that Courts should incline not to press questions of limitation too hard against plaintiffs), I hold that the present suit does fall within the six months' period provided for by section 59 of Act II of 1864 and that the lower Appellate Court's decision is correct.

The second appeal is, therefore, dismissed but under the circumstances without costs.

HANNAY, J.—I think that the decisions in Orr v. Secretary of State for India (2) and Sankarappa v. Secretary of State (5) are authorities binding upon us for the view that the period of limitation applicable to the present case is that prescribed by section 59 of Act II of 1864, and not Article 16 of the Limitation Act. For the reasons given by my learned brother I agree that this second appeal should be dismissed without costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47, O. XXX, rr. 5, 7, O. XXI, r. 50 (1), (2)—Execution—Order directing execution—Decree—Appeal—Partner in a firm individually served—Service without notice, effect of—Failure to appear—Right of decree-holder to proceed with execution.

An order directing execution to issue against a judgment-debtor is a final order under section 47, and is essentially a decree as it determines a question relating to the rights and liabilities of the parties with reference to the relief granted by the decree and as such it is appealable.

The concluding words of Order XXX, rule 5, of the Civil Procedure Code do not merely raise a rebuttable presumption, but lay down a definite rule of law that service on a person without the written notice contemplated by the rule is equivalent to a service as a partner.

Sub-section 2 of rule 50 of Order XXI is only applicable in the absence of the conditions in sub-section 1.

Rule 7 of Order XXX must be read as subject to rule 5 and contemplates only a case where service is on a Manager, and not a case where the person served is deemed to be served as a partner.

Where one of the partners of a firm refused to accept a summons, and the peon hung up a copy of the summons on the outer door of the place of business of the firm, and the partner failed to appear in execution proceedings,

BAISHNAB CHARAN SHAHA v. BANK OF BENGAL.

Held, that he was individually served as a partner and that since notwithstanding such service he failed to appear, it was open to the decree-holder to proceed with execution against him under Order XXI, rule 50 (i) (c) of the Civil Procedure Code.

JUDGMENT.

MOOKERJEE, J.—This appeal is directed against an order made on the 17th September 1912 for execution of a decree for money obtained by the respondent (Bank of Bengal) against two firms. The suit was instituted on the original side of this Court against the firms of Dinanath Narayan Chandra Shaha and Churamoni Dey and Jotindra Narayan Dey. As regards the first firm the names of the partners were not disclosed in the plaint, but as regards the second, it was stated that Jatindra Narayan Dey, Narindra Narayan Dey and Ganendra Narayan Dey were the members of the partnership business. The decree as drawn up was against these two firms. We are not concerned with the second firm, as execution in the present instance is sought against three persons who are alleged to have been partners of the firm named Dinanath Narayan Chandra Shaha. The District Judge has dismissed the application as against Lakshikant Shaha, on the ground that he has not been proved to be a partner; but he has directed execution to issue against Abhoy Charan Shaha and Baishnab Charan Shaha as, in his opinion, the case as against them has been brought within the terms of rule 50 of Order XXI of the Code of 1908. The present appeal has been preferred by these two judgment-debtors against the order in so far as it directs execution to issue against them.

A preliminary objection has been taken on behalf of the respondent to the competency of the appeal and reliance has been placed in support of it upon the cases of Deoki Nandan Singh v. Bansi Singh (1) and Panch Duar Thakur v. Mani Raut (2). It has not been disputed that if the order made falls within section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure and is a final order, it is a decree within the meaning of the Code and is liable to be challenged by way of appeal. In order to determine whether the order falls within the terms of section 47, sub-section (1), it is necessary to determine whether the order decides a question arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed and relates to the execution of the decree. There is no room for controversy that the order relates to the execution of the decree; nor is there any room for discussion that the question does arise between the parties to the suit. The case for the decree-holder is that although the suit was instituted nominally aginst the firm, it was in essence a suit against all the partners of that firm. But it has been argued that the order is not final, and reliance has been placed upon the circumstance that, at the present stage, the District Judge has only directed the issue of a notice under rule 22 of Order XXI, and it has been pointed out that after the judgment-debtors have been arrested, it will be open to them to show cause under rule 40 why they should not be released. In our opinion the fact that it is open to the judgment-debtors to avail themselves of the provision of sub-rule (1) of rule 40 does not alter the nature of the order. The order is not interlocutory and it is final in the sense that, in so far as the execution Court is concerned, it determines finally the liability of these persons to have execution issued against them on the basis of the decree. An order of this description is plainly a final order made under section 47 and is essentially a decree, as it determines a question relating to the rights and liabilities of the parties with reference to the relief granted by the decree [Jogodishury Debea v. Kailash Chundra Lahiry (3); Mukhtar Ahmad v. Moqarrab Hussain (4)]. The cases upon which reliance has been placed by the respondent are clearly distinguishable. In those cases, an order had been made by the execution Court determining the value of the property sought to be seized in execution, and it was ruled that an order of that description was not a final order, as it determined a merely incidental question as to the mode of conduct of the proceedings. The preliminary objection must consequently be overruled.

As regards the merits of the appeal, it has not been disputed that the casses of the two appellants do not stand on the same footing. In so far as Abhoy Charan is concerned, his case is covered by clause (b) of rule 50 of Order XXI of the Code. Sub-rule (1) of clause (b) of rule 50 provides that where a decree has been passed against a firm, execution may be granted against any person who has admitted on the pleadings that he is or has been adjudged to be a partner. In so far as Abhoy Charan Shaha is concerned, in the written statement which he filed in the suit on the 25th November 1909 he admitted that he and his partners carried on business in the name and style of Dinanath Narayan Chandra Shaha. His case consequently is completely covered by rule 50, sub-rule (1), clause (b), and execution has rightly been directed to issue against him.

The case of Baishnab Charan Shaha stands on an entirely different footing. On behalf of the decrees-holder it has been argued that his case is covered by clause (c) of sub-rule (1) of rule 50. That clause provides that where a decree has been passed against a firm, execution may be granted against any person who has been individually served as a partner with a summon and has failed to appear. The question for consideration is, whether Baishnab Charan Shaha was individually served as a partner with a summons in the suit, and notwithstanding such service failed to appear. The facts necessary for the determination of this question may be briefly stated. On the 2nd September 1909, an application was made on behalf of the plaintiff, in which it was stated that Baishnab Charan Shaha was a partner of the firm and it was prayed that the writ of summons in the suits might be served on him on behalf of the firm. On this petition the following order was recorded: "Be it so, at the applicant's own risk, under Order XXX, rule 3, sub-rule (a)." That rule provides that where persons are sued as partners in the name of their firm, summons shall be served either (a) upon any one or more of the partners or (b) at the principal place at which the partnership business is carried on within British India, upon any person having at the time of the service the control and management of the partnership businees, as the Court may direct. It is plain consequently that the plaintiffs elected to have summons served in accordance with clause (a) of rule 3 of Order XXX of the Code. When the summons came to be served, so far as can be gathered from the return of the peon, it was tendered to Baishnab Charan Shaha who refused to grant a receipt, whereupon the peon hung up a copy of the summons on the outer door of the place of business of the firm. The affidavit of the identifier describes Baishnab Charan Shaha as the agent of the firm, who was found present and was asked to receive the summons in the name of his master. There is no evidence on the record, except what appears on the affidavit, as to what was precisely stated to Baishnab Charan Shaha. But it may be assumed for our present purpose that the summons was tendered to him and he was asked to receive it as the Manager and agent of the firm. The question arises, whether this mode of service may be deemed individual service on him as a partner within the meaning of clause (c), sub-rule (1), of rule 50. As already explained, rule 3 of Order XXX defines the two alternative modes of service of summons in a suit instituted against a firm. The first mode is by service upon one or more of the partners. The second mode is by service upon the person who has the control or management of the business. If service is effected in either of these modes in accordance with law, there is a good service upon the firm as a corporate entity, and it is immaterial whether all or any of the partners are within or without British India. But there is a fundamental difference in the result of the two modes of service. In the case of service upon a partner, there is a good service not only on the firm but also upon the partner personally, which may render him liable in proceedings in execution to the extent stated in rule 50 of Order XXI. On the other hand, if there has been service upon a person who has the control or management of the business but is himself not a partner, although there is good service upon the firm, there is no individual service upon any of the partners. In this latter case, however, the decree-holder is entitled to proceed under sub-rule (2) of rule 50.

In this connection the effect of rule 5 of Order XXX requires careful consideration. That rule is in these terms: "Where a summons is issued to a firm and is served in the manner provided by rule 3 (that is, in accordance with either of the modes specified in that rule), every person upon whom it is served shall be informed by notice in writting given at the time of such service whether he is served as a partner or as a person having the control or management of the partnership business or in both characters, and, in default of such notice, the person served shall be deemed to be served as a partner." The object of the notice as to the capacity of the person served is obvious, namely, the Legislature intended to remove the possibility of dispute as to the character in which a particular person has been served. If there is a notice in writing, the person served is apprised of the character in which he is sought to be made liable. The notice may intimate to him that he is served as a partner or that he is served merely as the manager or that he is served in a two-fold capacity, namely, both as a partner and as a manager. It is worthy of note that the language used is, not that the person served shall be presumed to be served as a partner, but that the person shall be deemed to be served as a partner. The Legislature plainly intended, not merely to raise a rebuttable presumption as to the character in which he was served, but to lay down definitely the legal effect of the service. In the absence of a notice, consequently, the person must be deemed to have been served as a partner, and if he is in reality not a partner he should proceed in accordance with rule 8. That rule lays down that any person served with summons as a partner under rule 3 may appear under protest, denying that he is a partner, but such appearance shall not preclude the plaintiff from otherwise serving a summons on the firm and obtaining a decree against the firm in default of appearance where no partner has appeared. In the case before us, there was no written notice in terms of rule 5 of Order XXX. Consequently the appellant whose case is now under consideration must be deemed to have been served as a partner, and he cannot rely upon any representation alleged to have been made to him as regards his capacity by the agent of the plaintiff decree-holder. It would, indeed, defeat the whole policy of the law, if the provisions expressly formulated in rule 5 were allowed to be evaded by any representation made at the time of service. The object of the Legislature was to secure the service of process in partnership suits against a firm without practical difficulty, and that object would be completely defeated if the precise statutory rule were allowed to be evaded in the manner suggested by the appellant. There is no room for question that the appellant was duly served. The notice was tendered to him; he declined to sign the receipt and it was thereupon posted on the outer door of the premises of the firm; and the service effected in this manner was clearly in accord with rule 17 of Order V, which has in this respect altered the procedure laid down in section 80 of the Code of 1882. It was, consequently, incumbent upon the appellant to appear in the suit, if he wished to raise the question that he was not a partner of the firm and could not be made liable in that character. Rule 7 of Order XXX, to which reference was made in the course of argument, does not militate against this view. That rule merely provides that where summons is served in the manner provided by rule 3 upon a person having the control and management of the partnership business, no appearance by him shall be necessary, unless he is a partner of the firm sued. In the present case, the legal effect of the service of summons upon the appellant without the prescribed notice under rule 5 was service upon him in his capacity as partner, and the only method by which he could contest his liability as partner was by appearance under protest in accordance with rule 8. On these grounds I hold that the appellant was individually served as a partner with summons in the suit, and that notwithstanding such service, he failed to appear. It is consequently open to the decree-holder to proceed with execution against him under rule 50, sub-rule (1), clause (c). The ground upon which the appeal is sought to be supported must consequently be overruled in so far as both the appellants are concerned.

BAISHNAB CHARAN SHAHA v. BANK OF BENGAL.

The result is that the order of the District Judge is affirmed and this appeal is dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing fee at three gold mohurs.

The other appeal, it is conceded, will be governed by this judgment, and a similar order will be drawn up therein.

BEACHCROFT, J.—The decree has been passed against the firm of which the appellant Baishnab is alleged to be a partner. Therefore under Order XXI, rule 50 (1) (c), execution may be granted against Baishnab who admittedly failed to appear, if it be shown that he was individually served as a partner. That he was individually served there is no question. Not only is service proved, but the appellant relies on the affidavit of the indentifier, who accompanied the serving peon, to support the argument that he was served not as a partner but as Manager of the firm, for it is on this argument that he relies to escape the provisions of Order XXI, rule 50 (1) (c).

The appellant did not appear at any stage of the proceedings, still he filed his appeal against the order for the issue of a warrant of arrest against him. It appears that he refused to accept service of summons and it may be a matter for argument whether a person who has refused to accept service of a summons can plead that he was in fact served in one capacity and not in another. This point has, however, not been argued and I prefer to rest my decision on other grounds.

The only question then is whether he was served as a partner.

The application for service of summons on appellant on behalf of the firm alleged that he was a partner in the firm, and the order was for service on him under Order XXX, rule 3 (a). The affidavit shows that the summons was handed to him at the place of business of the firm and that he was asked to receive it in the names of his masters, the defendants, the identifier regarding him as the Am-mukhtar and agent of the firm. When he refused to give a receipt, the summons was affixed to the door of the place of business. This was good service under Order V, rule 17, whether appellant was served as partner or as a person having the management of the partnership business. Now under Order XXX, rule 5, when a summons has been served in the manner provided by rule 3, the person served is to be informed by written notice whether he is served as a partner or as a person having the control or management of the partnership business or in both characters and in default of notice, he shall be deemed to be served as a partner. The concluding words of rule 5 do not merely raise a rebuttable presumption, but lay down a definite rule of law that service on a person without the written notice contemplated by the rule is equivalent to service with notice that the person is served as a partner. Can this definite rule of law be affected by the fact that the identifier or the serving peon, the affidavit does not state which, asked him to accept the summons in the capacity of Manager, assuming that the affidavit means this, of the firm? I am of opinion that it cannot.

It is clear that a person may be both partner and Manager of the partnership business. Rule 5 of Order XXX also contemplates such a position. The affidavit does not suggest that the request to accept service as Manager involved the representation that appellant was not regarded as a partner. But, in any case, the terms of rule 5 of Order XXX are clear and whether the appellant was addressed as partner or Manager when the summons was handed to him, the absence of a written notice had the effect of making the service as on a partner.

It was suggested that the Court might under Order XXI, rule 50 (2), order trial of the question whether appellant was in fact a partner or not. But that sub-section is only applicable in the absence of the conditions in sub-section (1). I put it to Mr. Caspersz in the course of argument whether clause (c) of sub-section (1) of rule 50 would be applicable in the case of a person who was in fact not a partner, if the summons was accompanied by a notice that he was served as a partner. Counsel's reply, which was undoubtedly correct, was that it would be applicable. That being so clause (c) must be equally applicable when by Order XXX, rule 5, the absence of the notice has the same effect as notice that the appellant was served as a partner.

There is no real hardship in the rule. If the appellant wished to take the position that he was not a partner, he could have appeared under rule 8, Order XXX, under protest denying that he was a partner. It is suggested that as he was served as Manager, it was not necessary for him to appear under rule 7. But that rule must be read as subject to rule 5, and contemplates only a case where service is on a Manager and not a case where the person served is deemed to be served as a partner.

The appellant could have appeared under protest, but did not do so and if it be a fact that he is not a partner, he has only himself to thank for not having taken advantage of the steps which the law allows him to protect himself.

I agree that the appeals of both the appellants should be dismissed.

Dr. S. M. Suleman, for the Appellant.

Mr. Durga Charan Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The suit which has given rise to this appeal was brought by the plaintiff-appellant for a declaration that a sale-deed, dated the 17th August 1909, executed by his father, Hansraj Singh, in favour of Naurang Singh, the predecessor-in-title of the defendants, is null and void as against the plaintiff. The validity of the sale is questioned on various grounds. The lower Court has dismissed the suit, on the finding that the plaintiff was born after the date of the sale and is not, therefore, entitled to question its validity. It has further been found that the plaintiff was in his mother's womb when the sale was made, and it is not disputed for the purposes of this appeal that the property sold is ancestral property. The question to be determined in this appeal is, whether a son who was in his mother's womb at the date of an alienation by the father of ancestral property can contest the alienation. The decision of this question depends on the further question, whether a son in the mother's womb can be deemed to be a co-owner of joint ancestral property.

Under the Mitakshara a son acquires an interest in ancestral property by birth, the reason for the rule being, as pointed out by Mr. Golap Chandra Sarkar in his work on Hindu Law, page 210, 4th Edition, that the father and other ancestors are reproduced in the son. The question is whether birth relates back to the period when the child was in its mother's womb. Under other systems of law, such as the Civil Law and the English Law, a child is deemed for some purposes to be born when it is in its mother's womb. This rule is in several instances recognised by the Hindu Law. In the case of succession by a posthumous son, he takes a share in his father's property from the date of his father's death and he is regarded as being in existence, though he is only in his mother's womb and not actually born until afterwards. Again, in the case of partition, a son in utero at the time of partition is deemed to be in existence and the partition may either be postponed or a share should be set apart for him. [See Strange's Hindu Law, page 182, Jolly's Tagore Law Lectures page 132; Kalidas Das v. Krishna Chandar Das (1); Mayne's Hindu Law, section 472, 7 Edition.] It has also been held that the "rights of a son in the womb could not be defeated by a Will made by the father." [Hanmant Ramachandra v. Bhimacharya (2) and Minakshi v. Virappa (3).] So that in the cases of succession, partition and Will, a son in the womb has been regarded as one in esse. There is nothing to show that in the case of an alienation by sale a different rule obtains. Our attention has not been called to any text of Hindu Law in which an alienation has been excluded from what is deemed to be the general rule. The Courts below have relied on a passage in Mr. Golap Chandra Sarkar's Hindu Law, page 210, 4th Edition, which is as follows: "A child in the womb is not entitled to all the rights of a child in esse. A son's right of prohibiting an unauthorized alienation by the father of ancestral property cannot be exercised in favour of an unborn son." The learned author has referred to the case of Musammat Goura Chowdhrain v. Chummun Chowdhry (4) as an authority for the proposition laid down by him. That case, no doubt, supports his view, but it was dissented from by the Madras High Court in Sabapathi v. Somasundaram (5). The learned Judges held that "an alienation by a Hindu to a bona fide purchaser for value is liable to be set aside by a son who was in his mother's womb at the time of the alienation." In the recent case of Datla Venkatasubba Raju Garu v. Gattem Venkatarayudu (6) the same Court assumed that a son could contest an alienation made by his father at a time when the son was in his mother's womb. The same view appears to have been adopted by the Bombay High Court. (See West and Buhler's Hindu Law, page 803.) We agree with this view. Both on authority and on principle we are of opinion that a son subsequently born alive is competent to contest an alienation made by the father when the son was in the womb. The Court below was, therefore, wrong in dismissing the suit on the ground on which it dismissed it. We allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and remand the case to that Court with directions to re-admit it under its original number in the register and dispose of the other questions which arise in the case. Costs here and hitherto will be costs in the cause. The costs in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

JUDGMENT.

BAILLIE, S. M. (April 8th, 1914.)—The appellant is entered as the sole tenant of 8 bighas 11 biswas and the respondent as the sole tenant of 8 bighas 11 biswas. The total area 17 bighas, 2 biswas, had been up till 1910 recorded as a single holding. In 1910 there was an order of the Deputy Commissioner by which the present entry was made. The respondent now comes up and says that without his knowledge his holding had been divided up and half of it entered in the appellant's name. The Court of first instance after receiving a report from the Tahsildar held that the current entries represented the facts properly, that Sarupa was in independent possession of the area in her name and that the respondent had no connection with that land. The application was, therefore, dismissed. The Deputy Commissioner allowed the appeal against this order on the ground that section 39, clause (2), of the Land Revenue Act forbade the record of a division of a holding unless the consent of all the tenants had been attested before a Revenue Court or a Kanungo. He, therefore, ordered that the holding should be entered in the name of the respondent and the appellant recorded as sub-tenant for half of it. This order was upheld by the Commissioner on appeal. It not only cancels the previous order of the Deputy Commissioner passed in 1910, but on the mere ground that section 39 forbade the record of the division of a holding it transferred the name of the appellant from the position it now has as a tenant-in-chief to that of a sub-tenant. If for a moment it be considered that section 39 warranted the orders previously passed being ignored, all that the Deputy Commissioner could have done as a consequence of the application of that section would be to order that the holding be recorded as one with the appellant and the respondent as joint tenants. It appears to me, however, that the order of the Deputy Commissioner was entirely ultra vires. The matter had been decided in 1910 by the order of the then Deputy Commissioner, and the present Deputy Commissioner was not entitled to go behind that order or to lay down that it was incorrect.

I would allow this appeal, cancel the orders of the Commissioner and the Deputy Commissioner and restore that of the Court of first instance upholding the entry ordered in 1910. Costs on the respondent throughout.

TWEEDY, J. M.—I concur.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 694 OF 1913.

S. RAMASAWMY AIYAR AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

VANAMAMALAI AIYAR—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11—Res judicata—Test—Suit by son to set aside sale-deed executed by father, dismissal of—Death of father—Subsequent suit to set aside father's alienation of family property barred—Cause of action—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 126.

In order to determine whether a suit is barred by res judicata, the test to be applied is whether the issue was one on which the judgment of the previous suit was based, quite apart from the question whether the decision itself in the former suit would be affected by the matter being re-opened in the later suit or whether the decision in the former suit could not logically have been based on even a different finding.

Where the plaintiff's suit to set aside a sale-deed executed by his father in the defendants' favour in 1896 was dismissed, and on his father's death in 1910 the plaintiff again brought a suit in October 1911 to have the deed set aside and to recover possession of the plaint lands, alleging that a new cause of action arose on his father's death:

Held, (1) that a finding on the question of possession in the former suit was res judicata in this suit, the cause of action in both being the same;

(2) that the suit, being one by a Hindu governed by the law of Mitakshara to set aside his father's alienation of family property, was barred by Article 126 of the Limitation Act, as having been brought more than 12 years from the date when the alienee took possession.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tinnevelly, in Appeal Suit No. 343 of 1912, preferred against that of the District Munsif of Tinnevelly, in Original Suit No. 432 of 1911.

Mr. T. Rangachariar, for the Appellants.

Mr. M. O. Parthasarathy Aiyangar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The defendants are the appellants. The facts are a little complicated. It is necessary, however, to recite only the following to appreciate the questions of law which have to be decided in this second appeal.

The plaintiff's father who died in 1910 executed a sale-deed in favour of the 1st defendant in 1896, conveying two houses and the plaint lands for Rs. 3,000. The 1st defendant got possession of the lands, according to the 1st defendant's case, in 1896 itself on the date of sale. The plaintiff first brought a suit in 1906 to set aside the sale-deed executed by his father and to recover possession of the plaint lands on the following allegations:

(a) That the sale-deed was executed colourably;

(b) that it was executed without any consideration;

(c) that it was never intended to be given effect to;

(d) that the recitals of consideration therein are all false and fictitious;

(e) that the 1st defendant had no right or necessity to execute the sale-deed; and (f) that the said document is not valid and binding on the plaintiff.

That suit was dismissed with costs on the following findings of the lower Appellate Court:

(*a*1) that the sale-deed, Exhibit A, was not a colourable transaction;

(*a*2) that Rs. 1,995-8-0 of the Rs. 3,000, purchase-money, did pass as consideration for the sale and that that Rs. 1,995-8-0 went in discharge of debts binding on the plaintiff; and

(*a*3) that possession of the houses and lands at once passed to the 1st defendant.

Having failed in inducing the Court to set aside the sale-deed of 1896 in his previous suit of 1906 and having had those findings of fact, namely, (1) that the sale-deed of 1896 was a real transaction, (2) that nearly Rs. 2,000 of the purchase-money had been paid by the 1st defendant to the plaintiff's father for discharging antecedent debts, and (3) that possession had at once passed to the 1st defendant of the properties sold, given against him in the former suit, the plaintiff has brought the present suit in October 1911 praying in effect for the very same reliefs as in the former suit, namely, the setting aside of the sale-deed of 1896 and the recovery of the plaint lands from the defendants, and he relies in this suit on practically the very same allegations as in the former suit. There are, of course, some additions made in this suit both to the allegations made in the body of the plaint and to the reliefs prayed for at the end of the plaint. As regards the additional allegations in the plaint, the only material additional allegation is that even if there were antecedent debts to be paid out of the purchase-money as recited in the document, Exhibit A, such antecedent debts are not binding on the plaintiff's family. (See paragraph 5 of the plaint in this case.) As regards the additions made in the prayer portion, these additions consist of prayers for alternative reliefs, namely, that if the entire properties could not be delivered to the possession of the plaintiff, "such of the properties or portions thereof" as the Court thinks fit "may be delivered, either unconditionally or subject to conditions, to the plaintiff."

In the plaint in the present suit, the plaintiff has carefully avoided controverting the final finding of the Court in the former suit, that the possession of the plaint lands passed in 1896 itself to the 1st defendant. Not only did he not expressly controvert that finding, but he dates the cause of action for the present suit in 1896, though he gives that date, not on account of the fact that that date is the date of the taking of possession of the alienated properties by the 1st defendant, but because it is the date of the sale-deed. He further admits in paragraph 11 of the plaint in this case, as I understand that paragraph, that the present suit is prima facie barred by limitation. He, however, claims the benefit of section 14 of the Limitation Act, basing that claim upon the fact that the Suit of 1906 was finally disposed of only in 1911. He further wants to get out of the bar of limitation by contending that a new cause of action arose in his favour when his father died in 1910. He did not repeat in the plaint in this suit his allegation in the plaint in the former suit of 1906 that he was in possession till 1903. The lower Appellate Court's statement in paragraph 14 of its judgment, that according to the plaintiff the possession of the lands passed to the defendant only in March 1903, is not based on the pleadings in this case and it is in fact opposed to the inference to, be drawn from the deliberate omission of the plaintiff to repeat in the plaint in this suit that he lost possession in 1903 and that he is relying upon section 14 of the Limitation Act to save himself from the bar of limitation.

The learned District Munsif dismissed the plaintiff's suit as barred by res judicata and as barred by limitation. The lower Appellate Court first remanded the case to the District Munsif for findings on three issues, the first of which was, "When did the defendants in Original Suit No. 432 of 1911 get possession of the nanja lands sued for ?" The learned Subordinate Judge gave no reasons for this order of remand except stating that "it appeared" to him "that for the right decision of the suit" those issues should be remitted for trial and findings. When the District Munsif submitted the finding that the defendants got possession of the nanja lands sued for in 1896 itself, the lower Appellate Court did not accept that finding and it decided on the fresh evidence (which was allowed to be adduced in the District Munsif's Court in pursuance of the remand order) that the plaintiff lost possession only in 1903, and that the defendants' possession became adverse to the plaintiff only in 1903, holding further that the finding in the former suit that possession had passed in 1896 itself was not res judicata. I might further add that among the 11 grounds of appeal to the lower Appellate Court by the plaintiff, there is not a single ground which says that the plaintiff lost possession only in 1903 and that, therefore, the suit is not barred by limitation. On the other hand, the 4th, 5th and 6th grounds in the appeal memorandum relied solely upon section 14 of the Limitation Act to save the bar of limitation. Not only this, the plaintiff did not let in evidence before the Munsif in the first instance on the question of the date when he lost possession and there is no allegation in the grounds of appeal to the lower Appellate Court that he was precluded from letting in any evidence, and yet the lower Appellate Court in its remand order permitted him to let in fresh evidence on the question of when he lost possession.

It is unnecessary to deal further with the point whether the lower Appellate Court was justified in remanding the case to the Court of the District Munsif to give a finding on the question of possession and whether it was justified in upsetting that finding on the new evidence taken on remand. I am clearly of opinion that a finding on this question of possession in the former Suit No. 111 of 1906 is res judicata in this case against the plaintiff. The fifth issue in the former suit was, whether the sale to the present 1st defendant by the father of the present plaintiff in 1896 was only a colourable transaction. One of the main questions to be considered in arriving at a finding whether a sale-deed is a colourable transaction or a real transaction, is whether or not possession of the property sold passed to the vendee from the vendor. The District Munsif who decided the former case found in paragraph 21 of his judgment that possession was not parted with by the plaintiff's father to the 1st defendant (vendee), though the patta and kist receipts began to stand in the vendee's name from the date of the sale-deed, 1896. (See Exhibit 13.) But, on appeal, the lower Appellate Court went into the same question elaborately in paragraphs 17 to 22 of its judgment (Exhibit F) and found that vendee got possession at once in 1896. Now, it seems to me under section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, that the question when the 1st defendant got into possession under his sale-deed of 1896 was directly and substantially in issue in the former suit between the same parties litigating under the same title in a Court competent to try this subsequent suit and was heard and finally decided in the defendant's favour. The learned Subordinate Judge in this case tried to get over the bar of res judicata by the following argument. Though the question was tried and decided in the former suit, that question was only of relevant fact and not a fact in issue. That suit would have been dismissed even if the Court found that possession passed to the vendee only in 1903, as that Court could have found the sale to be a real transaction even if the possession passed only in 1903. The question of possession was not, therefore, essential to the decision of the former suit.

I am clear that the above reasoning is fallacious. The question of res judicata has to be decided, not on a consideration whether the decision of the controverted point was essential or necessary to the decision of the former suit, but upon the question whether it was directly and substantially in issue in the former suit. The word 'substantial' has not such a stringent signification as the word 'essential' or the word 'necessary'. In the Full Bench case reported in Bommidi Bayyan Naidu v. Bommidi Suryanarayana (1) Sundra Aiyar, J., has considered very elaborately the question of res judicata, and the test he lays down is whether the issue was one on which the judgment of the previous suit was based, quite apart from the question whether the decision itself in the former suit would be affected by the matter being re-opened in the later suit or whether the decision on the former suit could not logically have been based on even a different finding. There can be no doubt on a perusal of the judgment of the lower Appellate Court in the former case that the decision therein was clearly based on the finding on the question, when the possession of the alienated properties passed to the vendee. Of course, the decision on each one of several relevant facts on which a finding is based may not be res judicata unless that relevent fact can itself be considered a substantial question in issue. As to what is a substantial question and what is not a substantial question no invariable rule can be laid down except that if the parties by their conduct of the litigation clearly treated it as a substantial question and the Court also further treated it as a substantial question, it would be almost conclusive to show that that question was one substantially in issue.

Holding as I do that the decision on the question of possession in the former suit is res judicata, it is clear that under Article 126 of the Limitation Act the present suit, which is brought in effect to set aside the alienation made by the plaintiff's father in favour of the 1st defendant, is barred by limitation. The lower Appellate Court after remanding the case for the decision of the issue as to when possession passed, has considered (when the case was returned to it) the quite irrelevant question, namely, when the first defendant's possession became adverse to the plaintiff, and then applied Article 144 of the Limitation Act. Article 126 of the Limitation Act clearly applies to the facts and that Article says that a Hindu governed by the law of Mitakshara has got twelve years to set aside his father's alienation of family property, the time from which the period begins to run being the date when the alienee takes possession of the property. This suit, therefore, brought in 1911 is clearly barred by limitation.

I might further state that, in my opinion, not only is the question of possession res judicata by the decision in the former suit, but even the whole suit itself in the present case is barred by limitation by the decision in the former suit. The mere addition of a further useless allegation in the plaint in this suit that the plaintiff's father's antecedent debts, if true, are not binding, cannot make the present plaint to be based on a different cause of action from the cause of action set out in the former suit. It may be remarked that there is not even an allegation in the plaint that the antecedent debts are illegal or immoral. Nor can the addition of some alternative reliefs, which might and ought to have been claimed in the former suit, change the character of the suit. On this question, I shall only repeat the quotation which I made in the judgment of the above Full Bench case: "The same set of facts, which the mind at once grasps as jurally integral, ought not to be made the basis of repeated proceedings; the complaining party is allowed to frame his complaint in various ways, and the rule obtains that all the circumstances, which exist when the former of two actions is brought and can be brought forward in support of it, shall be brought forward then, not reserved for a second action arising out of the same events. The cause of action is regarded as identical, though the form of action differs on the second occasion, and the test applied is whether the evidence to support both actions is substantially the same.....Under a freer system of procedure, such as that of the Equity Courts in England or of the Civil Courts in India, second suits are to be admitted more sparingly than when the plaintiff has to proceed by set forms of action. As he can bring forward his whole case, unfettered by artificial restraints, and seek all remedies that the Court can justly award upon the facts proved, there is no reason why he should be permitted to harass his opponent and occupy the time of the Courts by repeated investigations of a set of facts which ought all to have been submitted for adjudication at once. His cause of action, into whatever Protean forms it may be moulded by the ingenuity of Pleaders, is to be regarded as the same, if it rests on facts which are integrally connected with those upon which a right and infringement of the right have already been once asserted as a ground for the Court's interference."

In the result, I would reverse the decision of the lower Appellate Court and restore that of the District Munsif, dismissing the suit with costs throughout in all Courts.

The memorandum of objections cannot be maintained, as it relates to a matter which ought to have been contested by an appeal from the District Munsif's decision to the Subordinate Judge and was not so appealed against.

Mortgagor and mortgagee—Agreement that mortgaged property shall be deemed sold if interest not paid on certain date—Failure of payment—Suit for specific performance—Interest after specified date, whether allowable to mortgagee.

Where a mortgagor agreed with his mortgagee that if he failed to pay all the interest due on the mortgage-money on a particular date, the mortgaged property shall be deemed to be sold to him for a certain amount and he should be paid the difference between that amount and the mortgage amount with interest due thereon; and on his failing to pay the interest on the specified date, the mortgagee sued for specific performance of this contract:

Held, that, as Equity regards as done what should have been done, the mortgagee became the owner of the property on the date the mortgagor failed to pay the interest and that he is not entitled to any further interest on the mortgage-money, but that he should pay to the mortgagor the difference between the purchase-money and the principal and interest due thereon up to the specified date.

Mr. Ormiston, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Fox, C. J.—One G. W. Davis mortgaged some land to Maung Shwe Goh, one of the respondents in this appeal, to secure the re-payment of Rs. 50,000 and interest. Being unable to re-pay the amount due on the mortgage, Davis wrote a letter in the following terms:—

"Rangoon, 4th April 1906."

"My dear Maung Shwe Goh,

"I write this to inform you that as I have not yet got the interest due on Rs. 50,000 ready now, I request you to give me three months more for payment to you or all interest due thereon. Should I fail to do so on or before the 6th July 1906 I agree to the whole land being sold to you for rupees one lakh (Rs. 1,00,000). After deducting out of this amount Rs. 50,000 already received by me and all interest due thereon, the balance should be paid to me when the land shall become yours unconditionally."

Davis did not pay the interest due on the 6th July 1906. Maung Shwe Goh called upon him to carry out the promise to sell the land contained in the above letter. Davis repudiated the letter. On the 17th August 1906, Maung Shwe Goh instituted a suit for specific performance of the contract. Litigation between the parties went on until July 1911, when His Majesty's order in Council on an appeal by Davis was passed. Davis had been ordered by an Appellate Bench of this Court to specifically perform the contract. His appeal against this decision was dismissed. Davis remained in possession of the property until the 24th March 1911, but paid no interest on the mortgage. In taking the account of what should be deducted out of the purchase-price of rupees one lakh, the Deputy Registrar allowed Maung Shwe Goh the principal, Rs. 50,000, and interest up to the 24th March 1911. Principal and interest amounted to Rs. 85,784-5-1. This calculation was confirmed by the Original Court. The appellant, who is a second mortgagee of the land, appeals against the order, contending that Maung Shwe Goh should only be allowed interest on the mortgage upto the 6th July 1906. The letter above set out appears to me to contemplate that the land should be Maung Shwe Goh's if Davis did not pay the interest due on the mortgage before the 7th July 1906, and if Maung Shwe Goh paid Davis the difference between the amount due on the mortgage up to that date and a lakh of rupees. Both parties must have contemplated that Davis' liablility to pay interest on the mortgage after that date should cease. It may be noted that Maung Shwe Goh was anxious to get the land at the price and there can be no doubt of his intention to pay what he had to pay if Davis failed to pay the interest due. If the agreement had been carried out, the mortgage would in law have become merged in Maung Shwe Goh's ownership of the land. Under the circumstances the maxim that Equity regards as done what should have been done is applicable.

In Birch v. Joy (1) the Lord Chancellor St. Leonards made the following remarks upon the relationship between seller and purchaser when a contract for a sale of land is made: "From the time at which the purchaser was to take possession of the estate he would be deemed its owner, and he would be entitled as owner to the rents of the estate, and would have kept them without account. From the same period the seller would have been deemed owner of the purchase-money, and that purchase-money not being paid by the man who was receiving the rents, would have carried interest, and that interest would have belonged to the seller as part of his property. A Court of Equity, as a general rule, considers this to follow. The parties change characters; the property remains at law just where it was, the purchaser has the money in his pocket, and the seller has the estate vested in him; but they exchange characters in a Court of Equity, the seller becomes the owner of the money, and the purchaser becomes the owner of the estate."

According to this, Maung Shwe Goh was entitled to the rents and profits of the land from the 7th July 1906 and Davis was entitled to receive from Maung Shwe Goh interest on the amount of money the latter should have paid on that date.

The fact that Maung Shwe Goh omitted to claim the rents and profits in his suit, cannot alter the position of the parties and enable him to continue his mortgage and so obtain subsequent interest after the date on which he in Equity became owner of the property.

The case of Wallis v. Bastard (2) relied on by the respondent's Advocate was a case in which a purchase by a mortgagee from her mortgagor was involved. I do not gather from the report that any different principle was adopted by the Court. The mortgagee obtained possession of the land a little more than three months after her purchase, but she did not pay the full purchase-money. Many years after sale, persons claiming through the mortgagor brought a suit for the balance of purchase-money due and claimed interest on it from the date on which the mortgagee had obtained possession after that date. No interest had been claimed or paid on the mortgage. The decision was that the amount due on the mortgage at the time when the mortgagee obtained posssession should be set off against the purchase-money, and the balance of such purchase-money after deducting the set-off should bear interest.

No doubt interest on the mortgage was allowed up to the time when possession was obtained by the mortgagee, but the case was one in which there had been no connection between the parties at the time, and the Lord Chancellor inferred, from the circumstances of possession having been taken in 1842 by the mortgagee and of no claim having been made for interest by either party, that there had been a perfectly understood agreement between them that one debt should wipe off a portion of the other debt.

In the case we have to deal with, there is nothing to indicate that there was a perfectly understood agreement that Davis should go on being liable for interest on the mortgage after the 6th July 1906, against which should be put interest on the amount due by Maung Shwe Goh up to the time the purchase-money was paid in full.

I would allow the appeal and setting aside the order appealed against, direct that an account be taken of what was due for principal and interest on the mortgage up to the 7th July 1906 and that Maung Shwe Goh be ordered to pay into Court the difference between that amount and one lakh of rupees. AMANTAKA PRASAD—JUDGMENT-DEBTOR—RESPONDENT.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 52—Lis pendens—Purchaser in simple money-decree between decree nisi and decree absolute, liability of—Pendente lite.

The purchaser of a property in execution of a simple money decree between the date of passing a preliminary decree for sale under Order XXXIV, rule 4, and a final decree under rule 5 of the Order in respect of the same property, is a purchaser pendente lite and is liable to the provisions of section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act, and his purchase cannot in any way affect the rights obtained by the decree-holder under the preliminary decree.

Execution first appeal from the decision of the Second Additional Subordinate Judge of Aligarh, dated 18th April 1914.

FACTS.—Kunwar Man Singh, the decree-holder, obtained a preliminary decree for sale under Order XXXIV, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code, on 31st of May 1913, against Jaikishore. Out of the many properties involved in the decree, one was sold in execution of a simple money-decree on 21st July 1913 and was purchased by the respondent, Amantaka Prasad. The final decree for sale under Order XXXIV, rule 5, Civil Procedure Code, was passed on 6th January 1914. The decree-holder applied for execution of the decree against Anantha Prasad as well and sought relief against him too. Amantaka Prasad objected to the execution of the decree, contending that he was wrongly impleaded in the execution proceedings and that his purchase was binding on the decree-holder. The lower Court allowed his objection and ordered his name to be struck off from the application.

The decree-holder appealed to the High Court.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, for the Appellants:—The respondent, Amantaka Prasad, purchased the mortgaged property during the pendency of the mortgage suit. He cannot have any right higher than that of the judgment-debtor. He purchased the property subject to the result of the suit and he is bound by the decree.

No doubt under Order XXII, rule 10, any person deriving title during the pendency of a suit may be brought on the record, but the rule is only an enabling provision and does not make it obligatory on the plaintiff or the decree-holder to make such a person a party to the suit or the proceedings. The mere fact of the respondent not having been impleaded as a party to the suit does not show that he is not bound by the decree.

Dr. Satish Chandra Banerji, for the Respondent:—I rely on Kadir Buksh v. Jawala Prasad (1). It was held that if a person who purchased the rights of the judgment-debtor was no party to the final decree, he was not bound by the decree.

[PIGGOTT, J.—Have your clients acquired any rights in view of section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act?]

This is not the question here. The question which has to be decided in this case is whether a decree to which the respondent was no party, could bind him. I submit that under the circumstances as exist in this case the decree is not binding on the transferee.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, in reply, referred to Faiyaz Hussain Khan v. Prag Narain (2).

JUDGMENT.—This is a first appeal by a decree-holder in an execution case. A preliminary decree for sale under Order XXXIV, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code, was obtained on the 31st of May 1913 against one Jai Kishore. Several properties were involved in this decree. One of these properties was put up for sale on the 21st July 1913 in execution of a simple money decree and was purchased by the respondent, Amantaka Prasad. The final decree for sale under Order XXXIV, rule 5, Civil Procedure Code, was passed on the 6th of January 1914. In applying for execution of this decree the decree-holder named Amantaka Prasad as one of the persons against whom relief was sought and notice was issued to Amantaka Prasad accordingly. The latter appeared in Court, presenting a petition of objections, in the course of which he did not content himself with alleging that he had been wrongly impleaded in the execution proceedings but claimed further that, by reason of certain events, his purchase was in some way or other binding on the decree-holder, so that the property purchased by him ought not to have been put up for sale. In dealing with this matter the Court below has contented itself with saying that the decree-holder might have impleaded Amantaka Prasad in the interval between the preliminary decree for sale and the decree absolute. As he has not done so, he was not justified in trying to bring Amantaka Prasad on the record as the legal representative of the judgment-debtor in subsequent execution proceedings. The formal order which followed was to the effect that Amantaka Prasad's objection is allowed, and his name be struck off the application for execution and the execution proceedings. As it stands. this order appears to be one that the property in Mouza Yahiapur involved in Amantaka Prasad's objection should not be put up for sale in execution of the decree. If this be the effect of the order, it seems to us that it was clearly wrong; but we are informed that it has not been interpreted in this sense and the property has actually been sold. Whether this be so or not, we think it advisable to amend the formal order lest it should give rise to difficulty hereafter. In our view Amantaka Prasad was a purchaser pendente lite pure and simple. He was liable to the provisions of section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) and his purchase could not in any way affect the rights obtained by the present appellant under the preliminary decree for sale. A case in many respects similar to the present, though somewhat stronger, decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council, is that of Faiyaz Husain Khan v. Prag Narain (2). If the appellant now before us has made any mistake, it has been in seeking to implead Amantaka Prasad at all in the execution proceedings. He does not admit that Amantaka Prasad acquired any title under his auction-purchase, and consequently should not have attempted to treat him as the legal representative of the judgment-debtor. If Amantaka Prasad had chosen of his own accord to come into Court, as a person in possession of property which was in danger of being sold in execution of a decree, and asked the Court to adjudicate on the matter, he might have been entitled to a hearing. As the case stands, we think that that portion of the lower Court's order which simply directed the name of the appellant to be struck off the file of the execution proceedings was correct. We so far allow the appeal that we amend the formal order of the Court by directing that the first few words of that order shall run thus, namely, "that the objections be so far allowed that the name of Amantaka Prasad be struck off, et cetera, et cetera." In other respects the appeal is dismissed. We leave the parties in this Court to pay their own costs.

Appeal partly allowed.

Where the vendor is in possession and disputes the vendee's claim to mutation, the latter cannot get mutation in his favour.

Appeal against the order of the Commissioner, Meerut, dated 27th February 1914.

Messrs. W. Wallach and Abdulla Jan, for the Appellants.

Mr. S. P. Boys, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Appellant's case has been placed before me at some length and as favourably to his claim as it could possibly have been done. The matter, however, appears to me to be so clear that no very lengthy judgment is required. Respondent must, I think, be held to be in possession and he has actually got dakhil kharij. He is held to be in possession, not because he collected certain odd sums from the tenants, but because on the 25th July the High Court directed that the Receiver, who was in possession under their orders, should make over charge of all the immoveable property concerned in Raja Balwant Singh's suit for possession to Raja Balwant Singh and because on the 7th August the Receiver, in accordance with these orders, delivered over possession by making over all the papers of the estate to Raja Balwant Singh.

The order of April 1913 giving dakhil kharij in favour of Raja Balwant Singh has been given slight consideration, but it was a valid and proper order passed without objection by the appellants. It is true that the actual possession at that time was that of the Receiver, but mutation is under ordinary practice effected in favour of persons on behalf of whom possession is held by a trustee.

Appellants claim record in accordance with a sale-deed executed on the 3rd March 1911. It was not, as the Commissioner says, a contract to sell; but an out and out sale in consideration of Rs. 1,50,000. This deed was executed while Raja Balwant Singh was suing the Rani for possession, and instead of the usual covenant for immediate possession, it contains a contract by Raja Balwant Singh that "bad hasil ho jane apne qabze ke qabza waqai upar jaedad mubaiya ke mushtarian ka kara dunga," and that till such possession was given he would pay Rs. 5,000 profits annually. The validity of this sale-deed was confirmed by the result of a suit brought by Raja Balwant Singh, and decided on the 3rd November 1911, to have the deed set aside on the ground of fraud. In that suit, the plaintiff withdrew from his claim and acknowledged that he had received the consideration mentioned in the sale-deed of the 3rd March 1911, and a decree was given accordingly. Appellants have not got possession. The evidence they adduce on this subject is of no value whatsoever.

The position, therefore, appears to me to be the same as if the appellants were claiming under a sale-deed executed by Raja Balwant Singh while in possession, the validity of that sale-deed being rightly or wrongly contested by Raja Balwant Singh. Appellants have virtually asked the Revenue Courts to assume the functions of a Civil Court and give possession under the sale-deed.

It is urged that section 34 of the Land Revenue Act contemplates that mutation should be given immediately on the execution of a sale-deed without inquiry as to whether the vendee has actually obtained full possession. It is pointed out that sub-section 2 provides for mutation immediately after the transfer has taken place and that in sub-section 3 the cases of mortgage and lease are distinguished, in that the mortgagee or lessee can only obtain mutation after he has demonstrated that he has obtained actual possession. It is not, I must say, clear why the Legislature has distinguished between cases of mortgage and lease and cases of sale by contract; but reading section 34 and the connected sections 35 and 40 together, it is clear that in no disputed case can mutation be given unless it is shown that the applicant has possession or that possession is doubtful. In the present case, as I have already said, possession is not doubtful. The order of the High Court has, I take it, exactly the same effect as a decree in favour of Raja Balwant Singh would have, and has given him possession over the property in question.

For these reasons the appeal is dismissed with costs on appellants.

The maximum fee of Rs. 80 under the Board's rule is allowed.

Appeal dismissed.

Declaratory suit—Pre-emption—Succession—Mortgage of ancestral land—Sale of equity of redemption, whether sale for purposes of pre-emption—Widow of donor still alive—Riwaj-i-am—Sale of ancestral house—Ancestral and acquired property.

A mortgaged his ancestral as well as acquired land to B and later on he gifted the mortgaged property and an ancestral house to B in lieu of the mortgage-money, plus past services and maintenance of A's widow till her death. A died leaving his widow. The reversioners of A brought a suit claiming

(1) immediate possession as heirs to A;

(2) pre-emptive rights in respect of the gift as if it was a sale;

(3) declaration protecting their reversionary rights:

Held, that the plaintiffs could not get possession of the land as heirs in the life-time of the widow.

Held, also, that as regards the area already mortgaged, the transaction should be treated as a valid gift of the equity of redemption in lieu of services and hence the plaintiffs could not get the land by pre-emption.

Held, further, that as the acquired property can be given to any one at the pleasure of the owner, the reversioners could not challenge the alienation of this property.

Held, lastly, that the reversioners were entitled to a declaratory decree only as regards the ancestral house, it not having been mortgaged before the gift of the equity of redemption took place.

Second appeal from the decree of the Divisional Judge, Attock, dated the 18th August 1911, reversing that of the District Judge, Mianwali, dated the 28th April 1911, decreeing the claim.

Mr. N. C. Mehra, for the Appellants.

Mr. Bhagat Ram, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—On the 13th February 1905 Mehra, Awan, grandson of Khushiya by his second wife, mortgaged 170-10/20 kanals to defendants Nos. 1 and 2, Awans of the village but not related to him, for Rs. 200. Nearly half the land was uncultivated and the rest of very poor quality judging by the revenue assessment.

On the 29th August 1909, he gifted to the mortgagees his equity of redemption, together with a further area of 9-8/20 kanals and a house (valued at Rs. 100), in consideration of services past and future. Ten days later he died and he is now represented by his widow, Musammat Nuran, defendant No. 7.

The plaintiffs, descendants of Khushiya by his first wife, have come into Court with a somewhat multifarious suit, claiming (1) immediate possession as heirs of Mehra, (2) pre-emptive rights in respect of the gift as if it were a sale, and (3) a declaration protecting their rights as reversioners in respect of the alienation. The lower Appellate Court has dismissed the suit in toto and the case is before us on further appeal by the plaintiffs.

It is quite clear that plaintiffs' claim for immediate possession as heirs of Mehra must fail in the life-time of his widow, Musammat Nuran.

As regards the alleged right of pre-emption, we have heard a good deal of argument based on Riwaj-i-am entries and rulings, but we do not propose to discuss it as we are satisfied that the lower Appellate Court is right in declining to treat the 1909 transaction as one of sale giving rise to pre-emptive rights.

There remains, therefore, the question of plaintiffs' possible right to a declaration as reversioners, which has been overlooked in both the lower Courts. Here too we consider that plaintiffs' claim must fail except to a very small extent.

We think that as regards the area already mortgaged the 1909 transaction should be treated as a valid gift of the equity of redemption in lieu of services. The additional area of 9-8/20 kanals then gifted free of mortgage was land acquired by Mehra by purchase on the 20th November 1908, and being self-acquired property could be gifted by him at pleasure without reference to his reversioners. On all this portion of the property in dispute the plaintiffs' suit fails, though not exactly on the grounds stated by the Divisional Judge.

The house included in the gift is, however, admittedly ancestral property and we do not think that there is any sufficient reason why this should pass out of the family on the death of Musammat Nuran. The house had not been included in the previous mortgage and stands, therefore, on a different footing from the land.

To that small extent the plaintiffs' appeal is accepted. The decree of the lower Appellate Court is modified in this respect only that while the remainder of plaintiffs' suit will stand dismissed, the plaintiffs are given a declaratory decree to the effect that the gift of 29th August 1909 will not on the death or re-marriage of Musammat Nuran, widow of Mehra, affect their rights as reversioners in the house property referred to in the deed. The parties will pay their own costs throughout.

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 42—Declaration that valid personal contract subsits, whether title to legal character or right to property—Suit for declaration for right to subscribe to Kuri fund, whether maintainable.

A declaration that a valid personal contract still subsists between the parties is not a right to declare a title to a legal character or a title to right to property, and no suit under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act lies for the declaration of such a relationship.

Therefore, a suit for a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to subscribe to a Kuri fund in place of another subscriber, does not lie under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Palghat, in Appeal Suit No. 721 of 1912, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Palghat, in Original Suit No. 360 of 1911.

Mr. C. V. Ananthakrishna Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Messrs. A. Narayana Sarma, K. P. Govinda Menon, for Mr. K. R. Subramania Sastri, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The first defendant is the appellant. He is the Karaiswan (or proprietor) of a Kuri which he started in August 1906. There were 11 tickets in the Kuri and the 1st defendant induced other persons to enter into contracts with himself on certain terms, which included the payment of subscriptions by them to the Kuri at the rate of Rs. 250 yearly for each ticket-holder. The first defendant allowed also each ticket-holder to assign his rights under each contract to third persons subject to certain conditions.

The plaintiff became the assignee of half of a ticket from the 2nd defendant, who had entered into one of the several contracts with the 1st defendant. The sixth subscription to the Chit had to be paid on the 17th August 1911. The plaintiff had to send Rs. 125 to the 1st defendant as subscription towards the Chit due on that date. He sent the Rs. 125, but the 1st defendant refused to receive it. Hence the plaintiff brought the suit on the 31st August 1911 for two reliefs, namely, (a) that the 1st defendant be compelled "to receive the amount due by the plaintiff for the 6th drawing after declaring that the plaintiff has right to pay subscription for the said Kuri," (b) "that the 1st defendant do give the plaintiff the due receipt of the Kuri for the 6th drawing."

The District Munsif disbeleived the 1st defendant's story that the Rs. 125 was not tendered before noon on the 17th August 1911 and believed the plaintiff's evidence that the money was tendered in proper time, but following Kristaya v. Kasipati (1) he refused to give a decree compelling the 1st defendant to accept the Rs. 125. He, however, gave the plaintiff a decree declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to continue payment of subscriptions to the Kuri conducted by the 1st defendant, as the plaintiff was not a defaulter. His decree was confirmed by the learned Subordinate Judge.

The contentions, argued on behalf of the 1st defendant in second appeal, are found in the grounds 2 and 4 of the memorandum of second appeal. Those two grounds are as below :—

"(2) The plaint does not disclose any cause of action" and

"(4) the suit for a mere declaration is not maintainable according to the section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, the plaintiff having the right to claim consequential relief."

(1) 9 M. 55.

Though in the 4th ground, it is contended that section 42 of the Specific Relief Act bars the suit because the plaintiff had the right to claim consequential relief, the argument at the hearing was somewhat different. The contention was that only a person entitled to any "legal character" or to "any right to property" can institute a suit for a declaratory relief in respect of his title to such legal character or right to property and that the plaintiff's suit to declare that he has contractual rights as against the 1st defendant does not come within the class of suits to declare a right to a legal character or a right to property. We think that the contention must be upheld to this extent, namely, that section 42 of the Specific Relief Act does not contemplate a suit like the present. We take it that a man's "legal character" is the same thing as a man's status. "A man's status or 'legal character' is constituted by the attributes which the law attaches to him in his individual and personal capacity, the distinctive mark or dress, as it were, with which the law clothes him apart from the attributes which may be said to belong to normal humanity in general." "According to Holland, the chief varieties of status among natural persons may be referred to the following causes :—(1) sex, (2) minority, (3) 'patria potestas' and 'manus,' (4) coverture, (5) celibacy, (6) mental defect, (7) bodily defect, (8) rank, caste and official position, (9) slavery, (10) profession (11) civil death, (12) illegitimacy, (13) heresy, (14) foreign nationality and (15) hostile nationality." (See Banerjee's Lectures on Specific Relief.) We think that a declaration that a valid personal contract still subsists between the plaintiff and the 1st defendant is not a right to declare a title to a legal character or a title to right to property.

Section 42 of the Specific Relief Act is, no doubt, not intended to be exhaustive as regards the circumstances under which declaratory suits can be maintained. In Robert Fischer v. Secretary of State for India (2) the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council contains the following sentences on page 282, "Now, in the first place, it is at least open to doubt whether the present suit is within the purview of section 42 of the Specific Relief Act * *. It is, in substance, a suit to have the true construction of a Statute declared and to have an act done in contravention of the Statute, rightly understood, pronounced void and of no effect. That is not the sort of declaratory decree which the framers of the Act had in their mind." This seems to show that declaratory decrees can be passed though they may not come under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act. In Kristaya v. Kasipati (1), the learned Judges say (at page 57): "It is suggested that a suit may be brought to obtain a declaration that the right has not been forfeited by default, and that it continues to subsist" (the right in question in that case was the right to pay a debt by instalments). "But the suit before us is not one of that kind, and it is not necessary for us to express an opinion on the question, whether, under certain circumstances, a declaratory suit may not be brought." This only shows that the learned Judges were not prepared to say without hesitation that such a suit would not lie in exceptional cases. But we have not been referred to any case in which any of the High Courts in India has given a declaratory relief in respect of rights arising out of a contract which would affect only the pecuniary relationship between the parties to the contract, and we do not think that there are exceptional circumstances in this case to take it out of the ordinary rule.

In the result, we reverse the decrees of the lower Courts and dismiss the suit in its entirety. Under the circumstances, the parties will bear their respective costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908) s. 97—Descision on question of limitation, misjoinder or jurisdiction, whether preliminary decree—Appeal.

A decision as to misjoinder, limitation or jurisdiction does not amount to a preliminary decree within the meaning of section 97 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908.

Therefore, a decision in favour of a plaintiff upon a preliminary defence that the matters in dispute were caste questions outside the jurisdiction of Civil Courts, does not amount to a preliminary decree from which the unsuccessful party must at once appeal by reason of section 97 of the Code.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Dharwar, in Appeal No. 190 of 1911, dismissing an appeal from the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Hubli, in Civil Suit No. 106 of 1910.

FACTS appear from the following order of reference made by Beaman and Hayward, JJ., on 30th June 1914:—

BEAMAN, J.—We think that in the present state of the authorities, the general question, what is and what is not a preliminary decree, needs to be considered by a Full Bench. We are sensible of the difficulty of stating the question in a sufficiently clear-cut and definite form. But this Court appears to have held that decisions on various points are preliminary decrees, and we feel grave doubts, not only whether the particular decisions are right, but much more, whether the reason underlying them is not capable of extension so as to cover a trial Court's ruling upon every disputed point arising during the trial. I find for example that I was myself a party to a ruling of this Court in Sidhanath v. Ganesh (1), which certainly seems to have held that the finding of an original Court upon three points—(1) misjoinder, (2) limitation, (3) jurisdiction—was in each case a preliminary decree. Upon further reflection, a careful examination of the cases bearing on the point and the definition of decree in the Code, along with every section contained in the Code which can throw any light upon the subject, I am convinced that that decision is wrong, that it goes much too far, and that if such findings really are preliminary decrees, it would be virtually impossible to deny that any ruling as to whether a document tendered were admissible or not, or a question objected to, relevant, would also be a preliminary decree.

Scott, C. J., who delivered the judgment in Sidhanath v. Ganesh (1) subsequently held in Rachappa v. Shidappa, Civil Application No. 21 of 1913, decided on April 9th, 1914, (unreported), that a decision of this Court upon a question of jurisdiction was not a decree giving the parties aggrieved by it a right of appeal to the Privy Council. These decisions certainly appear to be in conflict with each other.

Havingregard to the definitions of a "decree" and "a preliminary decree" in the Code of Civil Procedure, I have formed a very strong opinion that no finding by a trial Court upon such points as limitation or jurisdiction where that finding is in favour of the plaintiff and permits the suit to proceed can, in any true sense, be a preliminary decree. It further seems that virtually every true preliminary decree is actually provided for in the Code itself. A comparison of these with the class of findings I have just mentioned brings out the radical distinction in principle between them with sufficient clearness. For my own part, I would go even further, notwithstanding the current of authority in this Court, and doubt, with all becoming respect, whether in suits under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act a finding in limine that a party is or is not an agriculturist within the meaning of the Act, is a preliminary decree. That is a more difficult case requiring a finer analysis. But in every such suit the plaintiff claims some concrete relief he wants money or land, and a finding that he (or a defendant) is or is not an agriculturist does not conclusively determine any such right, but merely determines procedure, as a result of which the rights put in controversy will be settled and decreed. It is true that in many cases status alone may be decreed, and all such decrees are of course true decrees. But they are not preliminary. If the suit is for declaration of status, a decree conferring or refusing to confer that status concludes the suit, and leaves nothing more to be done.

(1) 17 Ind. Cas. 637; 14 Bom. L. R. 916 37 B. 60.

But in suits under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, a finding that a party is or is not an agriculturist, does not determine any of the substantial rights which the Court is asked to give or withhold. It is true that it is a matter in controversy in respect of which the rights must be determined. But so is every detail of procedure and rule of evidence more or less directly. As I understand the definition, it describes two things: (1) The legal rights of the parties which are to be decreed or not decreed. These are in a vast majority of cases concrete, as a sum of money or piece of land or house or some other form of real or personal property. (2) The said rights in respsct of any or all the matters in controversy. This means, as I understand it, everything which is necessary in law, during the course of a trial, to the establishment or refutation of the alleged right. Every fact which a plaintiff alleges and a defendant denies comes under this head, as well as all the rules of procedure and evidence which have to be enforced and followed during the trial. But these latter are means to an end, and the end is the right or rights claimed, and to be or not to be decreed. The far wider construction put upon the words in this Court is, in my opinion, uncalled-for and will lead in practice to the most disastrous consequences. The conduct of civil business is already slow enough, but how can it ever be finished if the trial Judge has to frame twenty preliminary "decrees" in the course of every trial and so open the door to twenty successive appeals before any decision on the merits has been given? Upon this subject I may be permitted to call attention to the weighty words of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Maharajah Moheshur Sing v. The Bengal Government (2). This is not a question of mere words, empty dialectic, but of great and far-reaching practical importance. I believe that this Court stands alone in the extension it has given to the meaning of the term "preliminary decree," and in view of the steadily increasing number of appeals from what are called preliminary decrees, and may fairly be said to have been held to be preliminary decrees by this Court, and the resultant delays, expenses and harassments to which suitors are being subjected, it is very desirable that the whole question should be fully considered and authoritatively settled by a Full Bench.

HAYWARD, J.—The plaintiffs sued defendants for an injunction in respect of certain religious ceremonies. The defendants raised a preliminary defence that the matters in dispute were caste questions outside the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts. The original Court held that the matters were within the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts. The District Court held on first appeal that this decision was not appealable at that stage, as it did not amount to a preliminary decree within the meaning of section 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This Court has been asked to hold on second appeal that the decision was a preliminary decree and subject as such to appeal, relying on the cases of Krishnaji v. Maruti(3) and Sidhanath v. Ganesh(1), in which it was held respectively that the decision as to the defendant being an agriculturist and the decisions as to misjoinder, limitation and jurisdiction were preliminary decrees inasmuch as they determined the rights of the parties with regard to matters in controversy in the suit within the meaning of section 2, Civil Procedure Code.

It has, however, been conceded that these decisions, if pressed to their logical conclusion, would cover all interlocutory orders passed in the suit, a result strongly condemned by the Privy Council in the following terms: "We are not aware of any law or regulation prevailing in India which renders it imperative upon the suitor to appeal from every interlocutory order by which he may conceive himself aggrieved, under the penalty, if he does not so do, of forfeiting for ever the benefit of the consideration of the Appellate Court. No authority or precedent has been cited in support of such a proposition, and we cannot conceive that anything would be more detrimental to the expeditious administration of justice than the establishment of a rule which would impose upon the suitor the necessity of so appealing; whereby on the one hand he might be harassed with endless expense and delay and on the other inflict upon his opponent similar calamities," in the case of Maharajah Moheshur Sing v. The Bengal Government (2) under the old Civil Procedure Code. It has been further pointed out that it was held in Rachappa v. Shidappa, Civil Application No. 21 of 1913, decided on April 9th, 1914, (unreported), under the present Civil Procedure Code, that a decision upon jurisdiction by the High Court had only the effect of regulating procedure and decided none of the rights of the parties for purposes of appeal to the Privy Council. It is necessary in all these circumstances to examine with particular care all the provisions relating to preliminary decrees contained in the present Civil Procedure Code, before coming to the conclusion that a result so strongly condemned by the Privy Council has been intended by the Legislature.

No doubt, such a result might be deduced from a literal interpretation of the words of the definition, "decree means the formal expression of an adjudication which...determines the rights of the parties with regard to all or any of the matters in controversy in the suit" and of the explanation, "a decree is preliminary when further proceedings have to be taken before the suit can be completely disposed of. It is final when such adjudication completely disposes of the suit" in section 2 (2). But it would appear that a limited interpretation was contemplated and that the adjudication determining the rights of the parties was meant to be an adjudication after a complete hearing of the case, because it has been provided that only after such a hearing should judgment be pronounced and be followed by decree by section 33. This has been made still clearer by the rules relating to the hearing of the suit. It has been provided that preliminary issues of law should be tried if those issues would dispose of the suit, by Order XV, rule 2, and that if the finding should not be sufficient for the decision there should be a postponement of the hearing of the suit, but that if the finding should be sufficient for the decision judgment should be pronounced, even though the hearing should not have been fixed for the final disposal of the suit by Order XV, rule 3. It has been further provided that only after the case has been heard, should there be judgment and that there should be a finding on each issue, unless a finding on one or more issues should be sufficient for the decision of the suit, and that the judgment should be the basis of the decree and that the relief granted or other determination of the suit should be clearly specified in the decree, by Order XX, rules 1, 5 and 6. The limited interpretation contemplated has been indicated with sufficient precision by the following rules, which specify the cases in which preliminary decrees may or shall be passed in anticipation of the prescribed final decrees. The cases are administration suits, suits for dissolution of partnerships, account suits and suits for partition, dealt with in Order XX, rules 13, 15, 16 and 18. The only other preliminary and final decrees provided are those in mortgage suits under Order XXXIV. Special forms for these preliminary and final decrees have been prescribed in Appendix D, Nos. 3, 4 to 11, 17 to 20 and 22 of the first Schedule. It has then been provided that if a preliminary decree should not give satisfaction there must be an immediate appeal and that the questions thereby decided should not be open to dispute on appeal from the final decree by section 97. But it has been recognized that there well might be many interlocutory orders, not appealable as orders under section 104 and not amounting to decrees, which might seriously affect the final decision of the suit and it has been expressly provided that such orders should be open to consideration on appeal from the decrees, by section 105, Civil Procedure Code. It appears to me incontrovertible in view of all these provisions that the limited interpretation indicated has throughout been contemplated and that the only preliminary decrees sanctioned have been exhaustively enumerated, subject of course to extension by further rules lawfully framed, and that in all other cases the final determination of the suits has been required before preparation of the decrees. This limited interpretation has moreover, the merit of avoiding the evils so strongly condemned by the Privy Council, and there would be a strong general presumption against any other interpretation out of respect for the Legislature.

This matter is of far-reaching consequence to the administration of justice and should therefore, in my opinion, be referred for final decision by the Full Bench.

Mr. Dhurandhar (with him Mr. G. S. Mulgaonkar), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The question arising in the suit in which this reference has been made is whether, a decision in favour of the plaintiff upon a preliminary defence, that the matters in dispute were caste questions outside the jurisdiction of Civil Courts, amounts to a preliminary decree from which the unsuccessful party must at once appeal by reason of section 97 of the Code, and the referring judgments call attention to Sidhanath v. Ganesh (1), in which it was held that decisions as to misjoinder, limitation and jurisdiction are preliminary decrees. This Court is of opinion that the judgment in the last-mentioned case was wrong and that such decisions are not preliminary decrees, nor is the decision in the referred case a preliminary decree. We also think certain dicta in Narayan Balkrishna Kulkarni v. Gopal Jiv Ghadi (4), which are based upon Sidhanath v. Ganesh (1), go too far.

JUDGMENT.—We are not prepared to differ from the conclusions of the learned Judge as to the extent included in Exhibit I. We also agree with him that when tenants have added to their holdings by encroachment and have been in possession of such encroachments for more than twelve years before 1st of July 1908 when the Act came into force, they must be deemed to have been in possession of the whole of their holdings, including the encroachments, as ryots and so to be entitled to occupancy rights under section 6 of the Act. But according to the finding of the learned Judge in paragraph 4 read with paragraphs 1c and 1*d*, defendants Nos. 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 and 23 were not tenants but simple trespassers, and according to the evidence of plaintiff's witnesses Nos. 3, 5 and 7, which is uncontradicted, their possession commenced within twelve years of suit and it is, therefore, open to the plaintiff to eject them. These respondents have not appeared, the decree must be modified accordingly with costs throughout as against these respondents. Mr. T. Prakasam, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.

SPENCER, J.—This is a suit to set aside an adoption. Two questions arise for decision: (1) whether the alleged adoption of the 2nd defendant is true; and (2) whether the refusal of the plaintiff to give his consent to the adoption invalidated any adoption made by the 1st defendant as the widow of the deceased Lakshmipati Raju.

Although the adoptive mother, the 1st defendant, has in this suit taken the part of the plaintiff and denied the factum of the adoption, I have no doubt that the Subordinate Judge was correct in the finding that the 2nd defendant was adopted. All the documents produced in the case from 1906 onwards describe him as an adopted son. Exhibit III is a promissory note executed by the 1st defendant as guardian of her adopted son, the 2nd defendant, which purports to have been attested by the plaintiff. D. W. No. 5 proved the fact that the plaintiff attested this promissory note executed in his (witness's) favour. The plaintiff, in the witness-box, professed himself unable to say whether the signature in Exhibit III was his or not. The 1st defendant made several statements before the public authorities acknowledging that she had adopted the 2nd defendant, and when her attention was drawn to these statements in her examination she flatly denied having made the statements. It is unnecessary to refer to the oral evidence, as, in our opinion, there is overwhelming proof that the adoption is true.

On the second point, the plaintiff is the divided brother of the late Lakshmipati Raju, and as such is the nearest reversioner entitled to succeed to his properties after his death. He states that he was not asked by the first defendant to give his consent to the adoption of a boy. On the evidence of P. W. No. 5 and D. W. No. 4, I must take it that this denial is not true. D. W. No. 4 states that the plaintiff was asked to give his son in adoption and that he refused, as the son was his only son. P. W. No. 5 states that the reason for the plaintiff's refusing his consent was that he said that he would forfeit the right to property which he would otherwise get. The Subordinate Judge treats this as a refusal based on "an evil intention to usurp the property after the death of the 1st defendant." Without using such language to characterise the refusal, we may see whether the refusal was based on improper grounds.

In Venkatakrishnamma v. Annapurnamma (1) it was held that, if a sapinda refused to consent but withheld his grounds for such refusal, the refusal would not affect the adoption; and also if the assent was withheld from improper considerations, such dissent would be of no avail to the party relying on it. In Ganesa Ratnamaiyar v. Gopala Ratnamaiyar (2) the Privy Council held that the consent of a sapinda given on the ground that by consenting he gained some material profit from the adoption was improper. On the same principle, it would appear that a refusal on similar grounds might equally be condemned as an improper refusal. In Parasara Bhattar v. Rangaraja Bhattar (3) the test applied was whether the refusal was "from interested or improper motives or without a fair exercise of discretion." The object of getting the consent of sapindas to adoption is declared in Venkamma v. Subramaniam (4) as being to get an independent judgment on the expediency of the proposed adoption. This being so, there can be no doubt that a sapinda who is called upon to exercise his discretion ought to be guided not by reasons personal to himself, but ought to act with a deliberate consideration of what is for the benefit of the family, especially that part of it which the widow represents. Applying such principles to the facts of this case, it is im-material that the plaintiff did not give his consent to the adoption.

Other sapindas executed a document, Exhibit X, which fully authorized the 1st defendant to adopt the 2nd defendant. Only Chinna Bapi Raju was not a party to this document; his brother Peda Bapi Raju signed it ; and there are indications that these two brothers were undivided at the time, the elder, Peda Bapi Raju, being the natural father of the boy.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 141, 144 – Execution proceedings—Decree-holder-auction-purchaser in possession—Auction sale set aside—Subsequent private sale by judgment-debtor—Application for mesne profits—Appeal—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 109.

Section 141 of the Civil Procedure Code does not make section 144 applicable to execution proceedings.

Where a decree-holder purchased the property put up for sale in execution and remained in possession thereof for several years, and after the sale had been set aside the applicant purchased the property from the judgment-debtor together with the right to sue the decree-holder for mesne profits and applied for recovery of mesne profits:

Held, (1) that the application was not one authorized by the terms of section 144 of the Civil Procedure Code, as no restitution was sought in respect of any decree which had been varied or reversed;

(2) that inasmuch as the determination of a question under section 144 is a decree, an appeal lies from an order purporting to be made under that section.

A Court has no jurisdiction to award mesne profits for a longer period than three years as provided in Article 109 of the Limitation Act.

Second appeal from a decision of the Sub-Judge of Pabna and Bogra, dated 25th March 1912, affirming that of the Munsif, first Court, at Pabna, dated 10th May 1911.

Babus D. N. Chuckerbutty and Romesh Chandra Sen, for the Appellant.

Babus Mohini Mohan Chuckerbutty and Shama Chandra Roy, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—It appears that a sale held in the year 1900 in execution of a decree, at which the decree-holder was the auction-purchaser, was afterwards set aside on the 29th June 1907. The decree-holder was in possession of the property sold from November 1900 to June 1908. On the 10th May 1909, the applicants in the present case purchased the property from the judgment-debtor together with the right to sue the decree-holder for mesne profits in respect of the period during which he had been in possession. On the 2nd April 1910, the applicant presented the application for mesne profits out of which this second appeal has arisen.

The Courts below have concurred in treating the application as an application under section 144 of the present Code of Civil Procedure and have accordingly given the applicant a decree for mesne profits to the amount of Rs. 1,350. The appellant before us is Dino Nath Das, the decree-holder-auction-purchaser.

Now, in the first instance, it is quite clear that whatever may have been the power of the Courts to entertain this application, it is not one authorized by the terms of section 144. Section 144 begins: "Where and in so far as a decree is varied or reversed, the Court of first instance shall, on the application of any party entitled to any benefit by way of restitution....." But here no restitution was sought in respect of any decree which had been varied or reversed and section 141 of the Code does not make section 144 applicable to execution proceedings [Beni Madho Singh v. Pran Singh (1)]. Inasmuch, however, as the respondent obtained an order in his favour in the Courts below purporting to be made under section 144 of the Code, and inasmuch as a determination of a question arising under section 144 is a decree by force of the definition clause in section 2, the respondent cannot be heard to say that the present appeal is incompetent. The fact, therefore, that the Courts below had no jurisdiction under section 144 to entertain the application does not help the respondent.

Before we deal with the ground of appeal on which the appellant principally took his stand, we may premise that the appellant did not press the objection that a right to sue for mesne profits is not transferable, and was willing to concede for the purposes of this case that a Court might have some inherent power to entertain an application of this kind. We are not concerned, therefore, to dispute the view taken upon the latter question in the case to which we have already referred. Nor is it necessary for us to consider whether the application is one which does or does not fall within the scope of section 47. Assuming that it falls within that section, it still remains that the relief sought is dependent upon the supposed inherent powers of the Court to grant relief of this kind by way of restitution in the course of execution proceedings.

Now the only objection that was insisted upon was the objection that in any view of the matter, the Courts below erred in awarding mesne profits for the whole of the period during which the appellant was in possession. The contention was put in this way: that if a suit had been instituted for mesne profits on the date on which the application was made, then under Article 109 of the Limitation Act, the applicant as plaintiff would have been debarred from recovering mesne profits for any period in excess of three years from that date, and no inherent power of the Court—assuming any inherent power to exist—can entitle him to mesne profits for a longer period. This reasoning is supported by the case of Safaraddi v. Durga Prosad Sen (2), and, in our opinion, ought to prevail.

Assuming, therefore, without deciding that the first Court had inherent jurisdiction to award mesne profits upon the application presented by the respondent, it either had no power, or it was an improper and unsound exercise of judicial discretion, to award mesne profits for a period in excess of the period for which mesne profits could have been obtained by suit.

The result is that the decree appealed from must be modified by declaring that the respondent is entitled to mesne profits only for the period between 2nd April 1907 and June 1908. The amount awarded by the Courts below will be diminished accordingly. The parties will receive and pay costs in this Court and the Court below in proportion to their success or failure.

Decree modified.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), s. 112—Landlord and tenant—Suit under s. 112—Burden of proof—Payment of rent into Court to avoid sale, effect of.

In a suit under section 112 of the Madras Estates Land Act the burden of proof is rightly imposed on the landlord to show that he is justified in claiming rent at an enhanced rate; the fact of the payment into Court in order to avoid the sale does not shift the onus on to the tenant.

Second appeals against the decrees of the District Court of Vizagapatam, in Appeal Suits Nos. 229, 230 and 231 of 1912, respectively, preferred against those of the Deputy Collector of Vizayanagaram, in E. L. A. S. Nos. 575, 579 and 578 of 1912, respectively.

Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—These appeals are argued solely on the ground that the burden of proof was imposed wrongly on defendant,

Re BOMBAY GAS COMPANY AND BOMBAY ELECTRIC SUPPLY.

This is contended with reference to Chunder Kant Mukerjee v. Hem Lal Mondal (1), on the ground that "if plaintiff wanted the money back" which he had paid into Court, "it was for him to show that he had a right to get it."

In the present case the rent appears to have been paid into Court under section 129 or 195 of the Estates Land Act in order to prevent the sale, in connection with which plaintiffs are suing under section 112. Nothing in the Act indicates that the incidence of the burden of proof is affected by a payment into Court, nor have we been referred to any general principle authorising that view. On the other hand, the pleadings show that defendant was admittedly claiming rent at a higher rate than had been paid in the past; and the burden of proof that he was justified in doing so was rightly imposed on him, vide section 27.

The appeals fail and are dismissed. Plaintiffs have not appeared. There will be no order as to costs.

Re THE ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE BOMBAY GAS COMPANY, LTD., AND THE BOMBAY ELECTRIC SUPPLY AND TRAMWAYS COMPANY, LTD.

In re THE INDIAN ARBITRATION ACT.

Electricity Act (IX of 1910), ss. 14, 19—Damages, right of—Access to property cut off—Operator, whether can claim damages.

Where a Gas Company was cut off from reasonable access to its own property by acts done in the exercise of its powers by an Electric Supply Company, and those acts were not so done as to cause the least damage, detriment or inconvenience to the Gas Company that might be:

Held, (1) that upon a true construction of Act IX of 1910, the damage claimed to have been suffered by the Gas Company was the subject of compensation under section 19 of the Act;

(2) that section 14 did not apply and the Gas Company could not be deprived of its remedy in respect of the portion of the cables.

Obiter dictum.—An operator cannot claim damages for acts of his own or done on his behalf and at his expense by the owner.

Mr. Strangman, for the Bombay Electric Supply and Tramways Company.

Mr. Binning, for the Bombay Gas Company.

Mr. Nicholson, for the Arbitrators.

JUDGMENT.—In the special case submitted to us by the Arbitrators there are two questions for our consideration. In our opinion the first question referred must be answered in the affirmative. Large powers are conferred upon licensees under the Act, but these are accompanied by certain obligations. Thus under section 19 of the Act of 1910, the licensee is under the obligation of causing as little damage, detriment or inconvenience as may be in exercise of the powers conferred upon him "and shall make full compensation for any damage, detriment or inconvenience caused by him or by any one employed by him." The question is thus worded:—"Whether upon a true construction of Act IX of 1910 the damage claimed to have been suffered by the Gas Company is the subject of compensation under section 19 of the said Act?" Clearly it is. For the damage claimed to have been suffered lies in the Gas Company having been deprived of access to its own property by acts done by the Supply Company in the exercise of its power. The Supply Company's contention is that such damage could not be the subject of compensation under section 19, because it was not caused in the "exercise of the power" but was a mere consequence of what was otherwise in all respects rightly done by the Supply Company in the exercise of that power. This, in our opinion, is wrong. Whether there was in fact damage or not, what is alleged as damage was clearly caused once and for all in the exercise of the power conferred upon it by the Supply Company, when by laying its wires over the Gas Company's pipe, it cut the latter off from reasonable access to its own property. The case of Swansea Corporation v. Harpur (1), cited in support of this contention, is so different both in its facts and the principle upon which it is decided, that we think it unnecessary to discuss it. It is further contended on behalf of the Supply Company that if in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it, it has caused as little damage, detriment or inconvenience as may be, it cannot be liable in damages under section 19. Whether it has, in fact, caused as little damage as may be, is not a question of law but of fact, and must be answered by the Arbitrators. But assuming that that is the true construction of the sentence, notwithstanding the words immediately following, "make full compensation for any damage," it would still be a question of fact whether and to what extent that minimum damage had been exceeded, and, if exceeded even by one rupee, the licensee would be bound to pay that rupee. The point of the Gas Company's complaint is that more than this minimum of damage, detriment or inconvenience was caused by the Supply Company, and that is a question yet to be answered by the Arbitrators.

(1) (1912) 3 K. B. 493; 81 L. J. K. B. 1103; 107 L. T. 6; 76 J. P. 490; 10 L. G. R. 677.

In our opinion, the second question must be answered in the negative. What the question really invites us to do, although it might perhaps have been more happily worded and the Hon'ble Advocate-General admits this, is to decide whether in this matter the Gas Company was bound to proceed under section 14 or, in other words, whether that section applies. For, if it does, there is an end of the Gas Company's case. There could be no claim for damages by the operator against the owner under that section of the nature of the damages now claimed by the Gas Company. All acts done under that section are done by the operator or by the owner at his request and expense. It is, therefore, perfectly clear that the operator could not claim damages for acts of his own or done on his behalf and at his expense by the owner. Here the claim is quite differently grounded. What in effect the Gas Company complains of is that it was cut off from access to its own property by acts done in the exercise of its power by the Supply Company and that those acts were not so done as to cause the least damage, detriment or inconvenience to the Gas Company that might be.

Costs of this reference to be dealt with by the Arbitrators.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Income Tax Act (II of 1886), ss. 14, 15, 39—Liability of executor as such—Jurisdiction to determine a person to be chargeable—Suit to set aside assessment—Payment under coercion.

In order to succeed in a suit for a declaration that the Collector in realising certain sums from the plaintiff as income-tax acted without jurisdiction, and for a decree for the amount realised, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the payment was made by him under coercion.

There is no personal exemption in the Income Tax Act of which an executor as such can take advantage.

Income accruing to an executor under the Will of a testator is income liable to be taxed within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, and the Collector acts within the limits of his jurisdiction in determining such person to be chargeable.

A suit for a declaration that the plaintiff as executor to the estate of a deceased is not liable to pay income-tax in respect of any income of the said estate is barred by section 39 of the Act.

JUDGMENT.

JENKINS, C. J.—This is a suit brought by Mr. A. H. Forbes, who is described as executor to the estate of the late A. J. Forbes, against the Secretary of State for India in Council, and the prayer of the plaint is for a declaration that as executor to the estate of the late A. J. Forbes the plaintiff is not liable to pay income-tax in respect of any income of the said estate and that the said Collector in realizing the sums paid to him acted without jurisdiction, and for a decree for the sum of Rs. 912-3-3, being the amount realized, with interest. To succeed in this suit, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the payment had been made by him under coercion. It is unfortunate that there was no direct issue on that point, nor has our attention been drawn to any finding of fact as to this, but it may be assumed for the purposes of this case that there was coercion within the meaning of section 72 of the Contract Act as interpreted by the Privy Council case in Kanhaya Lal v. National Bank of India Ltd. (1).

What then is the ground on which this declaration is sought? This has not been made clear to us in the course of the argument.

The case turns upon the Income Tax Act (II of 1886), which is described as "an Act for imposing a tax on income derived from sources other than agriculture." The preamble is in these terms: "Whereas it is expedient to impose a tax on income derived from sources other than agriculture; It is hereby enacted as follows." Then there is a definition of income, as being income and profits accruing and arising or received in British India, and includes, in the case of a British subject within the dominions of a Province or State in India in alliance with Her Majesty, any salary, annuity, pension or gratuity payable to that subject by the Government or by a local authority establishd in the exercise of the powers of the Governor-General in Council in that behalf." Chapter II of the Act deals with the liability to tax, and it commences with section 4 which provides that "subject to the exceptions mentioned in the next following section, these shall be paid, in the year beginning with the 1st day of April 1886, and in each subsequent year, to the credit of the Government of India, or as the Governor-General in Council directs, in repsect of the sources of income specified in the first column of the second Schedule to this Act, as tax at the rate specified in that behalf in the second column of that Schedule." Section 5 provides for certain exceptions and enacts that nothing in section 4 shall render liable to the tax the several sources of income there indicated. It is not suggested that the income with which we are now concerned comes within any one of those exceptions. But the argument would appear to be that though that which has been taxed is 'income,' still because the recipient is an executor, no tax is payable. There is no provision in the Act which authorizes such a view. There is an exemption provided in favour of those whose income does not reach a certain amount, but apart from that there is no personal exemption of which an executor as such could take advantage. Chapter II merely deals with the liability of the subject-matter to tax. Chapter III deals with assessment and collection, the natural sequel to the general liability imposed by Chapter II. It deals with income under four heads which correspond with the four sources of income set forth in the second Schedule to the Act. The first source of income is salaries and pensions, second, profits of companies, third, interest on securities and fourth and last, other sources of income. For the purpose of the argument before us it has been assumed that the income with which we have to deal comes under the last of these four heads. While it is provided with regard to the first three classes of income that the tax shall be deducted or be paid for as expressly indicated, the wider class of incomes coming under clause (d) was not capable of such simple treatment, and so we find it is provided by section 14 that "the Collector shall, from time to time, determine what persons are chargeable under Part IV, and the amount at which every person so chargeable shall be assessed." Apart from that, there is no indication, within or without the Act, of the person who is chargeable in respect of other sources of income, and it will be noticed that it is the Collector who shall determine what persons are chargeable in respect of these other sources of income. It may be that there is a limitation placed upon the Collector's decision by the words of section 15, which clearly indicate—as common-sense indeed would determine—that the person chargeable is the person to whom the income accrues. All that appears very simple, and in this case it has been observed by the Collector, who has come to the conclusion that the subject-matter with which he was dealing was income, as admittedly it was, and so was subject to tax. He further determined that the plaintiff, being the person to whom the income accrued, was the person chargeable under Part IV. In so determining he was exercising a jurisdiction that was clearly vested in him by the Act, and I cannot see how it can be said that he purported to exercise a jurisdiction which he did not possess and so did not make an assessment under the Act.

It has been argued before us that sections 20 to 23 throw a flood of light on the case favourable to the plaintiff. I fail to see it. They deal with a special class of cases, and principally of persons who by incapacity arising from some personal defect or non-residence are unable to be approached and dealt with directly, and the sections provide that trustees, guardians, committees, agents and so forth may be dealt with in their places. They further make a special provision for Receivers or Managers in whom no property vests, and also the Court of Wards, Administrators-General and Official Trustees. But if it be argued from this that it affords an indication that income accruing to an executor under the Will of a testator is not liable to be taxed, I am of opinion that the agrument has no value and no force. I have indicated my views to the effect that this is income which is liable to be taxed within the meaning of the Act. I have also shown that the Collector has determined that the plaintiff is a person chargeable and that in so doing he acted within the limits of his jurisdiction. That being so, it appears to be a case where according to section 39, it is right to say that the suit does not lie. It has, therefore, been rightly dismissed by the lower Court and we dismiss the appeal with costs.

If a Court decides to restore a suit dismissed for default on payment of damages by the plaintiff, the proper order to pass is to direct the plaintiff to deposit the amount of damages within a prescribed period and to reserve the passing of any final order until the prescribed period expired.

But if a Court orders restoration of a suit on condition of payment of damages within a prescribed period and at the same time directs that otherwise the application for restoration shall stand dismissed, the Court completely disposes of the application and after its order has produced its effect of dismissing the application, an appeal lies against the order, and the Appellate Court is entitled and, therefore, bound to consider whether the damages allowed by the Court below were adequate or grossly excessive.

First appeal from an order of the Subordinate Judge of Agra.

Mr. Lalit Mohan Banerji (with him Mr. Shiam Krishna Dar), for the Appellant.

Mr. Sarat Chandra Chaudhri (for Dr. Satish Chandra Banerji), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a plaintiff's appeal, which purports to be brought against an order rejecting his application to set aside the dismissal of his suit for non-appearance. It appears that the suit in question was set down for hearing on the 2nd of January 1914. The plaintiff had not appeared when the suit was called on, and it was accordingly dismissed. We may take it that the plaintiff presented himself in Court later on the same day. In applying under Order IX, rule 9, of the Code of Civil Procedure, for restoration of the suit, the plaintiff put in an affidavit explaining that he had been accidently delayed on his way to the Court. With reference to this affidavit the Subordinate Judge thinks that it does not afford sufficient reason for the plaintiff's failure to be present when the suit was called on for hearing. It appears however, that there was some discussion before the Court, and that the defendants informed the Court that they would have no objection to the granting of the plaintiff's application, provided each set of the defendants were paid adequate damages on account of costs incurred to date. Upon this an order was passed directing the plaintiff to pay, within one week, the sum of Rs. 250 to each of the four sets of defendants and providing that in the event of his failing to do this, the application to have the suit restored should stand dismissed. A preliminary objection has been taken that no appeal lies. We have ourselves referred to a reported case of this Court, namely, that of Jagarnath Sahi v. Kamta Prasad (1). The facts of that case were not precisely on all fours with those now before us; but an opinion was expressed as to the proper form which an order in a case like the present should take. According to this view, the proper order for the Court below to have passed would have been one simply directing the plaintiff to deposit the sum of Rs. 1,000 in Court within a week, and reserving the passing of any final order on his application until the prescribed period had expired. Whether this be so or not, it is clear to us in the present case that the Court below proceeded to pass an order which was intended to, and did in fact, completely dispose of the application for restoration of suit. It provided that in a certain event the application should be allowed, and in a certain event it should stand dismissed. The present appeal has been brought admittedly after the second of these events had occurred, and consequently after the order passed by the Court below had produced its effect of dismissing the plaintiff's application. On this ground we hold that an appeal lies.

Having considered the case on the merits, we desire to point out that, if the learned Subordinate Judge was satisfied that the plaintiff had failed to show sufficient cause for his non-appearance, he might thereupon have dismissed his application, and it is probable in that case that we should not have interfered. As matters stand the Court passed an order, based in part on the admission of the defendants themselves that they were prepared to consent to the restoration of the suit on payment of adequate damages. We think we are entitled to consider in appeal, and it is therefore our duty to consider, whether the damages allowed by the Court below were adequate or grossly excessive. We should be prepared to allow a considerable margin of discretion to Subordinate Courts in a case like the present; but having looked into the matter it appears to us, firstly, that the sum ordered to be paid as damages was at least double the sum to which the defendants could make out any reasonable claim, and, secondly, that the period of seven days allowed for payment was exceedingly short. In fact the Court below seems to have taken away with one hand what it purported to give with the other. We, therefore, so far modify the order of the Court below that we substitute for it an order admitting the plaintiff's application for restoration of his suit, subject to his paying into the Court below by the 2nd of December 1914 the sum of Rs. 125 as costs on account of each of the four sets of defendants, that is to say, a total sum of Rs. 500. The costs of this appeal will be costs in the suit.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from a decree of Mr. Justice Macleod dismissing the suit.

The suit was filed by Bansidhar Lachminarayan, now an insolvent and represented by the Official Assignee, to recover from the defendants Rs. 3,000 with interest from the 10th June 1912 upon a plaint containing the following allegations.

On the 10th of June 1912, the plaintiff received a letter, addressed to his firm in Bombay, purporting to be from one Ramlal Ramprasad of Harpalpur in Alipur State in the Bundelkhand Agency. The letter enclosed what purproted to be a railway receipt for 300 bags of linseed stated to have been consigned by Ramlal from Ranipur Station, and the plaintiff was asked to sell the goods and meantime to accept and pay on presentment two hundis for Rs. 3,000 each, dated the 15th Jeth Sudi 1969, drawn by Ramlal in favour of the second defendant firm of Munalal Gayaprasad. On the same day one of the hundis, being a Shah Jog Hundi drawn on the plaintiff by Ramlal in favour of Munalal, was presented by the first defendant and on the same day the other hundi mentioned in the letter was presented by Gopaldas Vallabdas.

The first defendant's firm being respectable Shroffs and fulfilling the qualifications of a Shah, the plaintiff paid them the amount of the hundi on their responsibility according to the well-established custom in regard to Shah Jog Hundis. The plaintiff delivered the railway receipt to one Kilachand in fulfilment of a contract for sale of linseed and received from Kilachand Rs. 5,600. As the goods mentioned in the railway receipt never arrived, the plaintiff in August took back the railway receipt and refunded the amount paid by Kilachand. He was informed by the Railway Company on the 22nd of August that the railway receipt appeared to be a fabrication. The plaintiff also began inquiries on his own account, from which he had reason to believe that the second defendant firm belonged to Kamlaprasad Munalal, the Station Master of Harpalpur, that no such person or firm as Ramlal Ramprasad, by whom the hundis purported to be drawn, ever existed and that the hundis and the railway receipt were fabricated by the said Kamlaprasad Munalal or by some one at his instigation or in collusion with him for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff. The plaintiff says that in accordance with the well-established custom among Shroffs and according to the rules of the Marwari Panch Shroff Association in respect of hundis, the Shah who obtains payment of a Shah Jog Hundis is, in the event of the hundi turning out to be a false, fraudulent, stolen or forged hundi, bound to refund the amount of the hundi with interest, unless he produces the actual drawer or the person who committed the fraud.

It was proved at the hearing that the above statement of facts as appearing in the plaint was not correct, in that the hundi was presented for payment to the plaintiff on the 10th June by the first defendant and payment was then refused and was only made on the 11th after the arrival that day of the railway receipt and after the payment by Kilachand of Rs. 5,600, being ninety per cent. of the price of the linseed supposed to be represented by the railway receipt. It was also proved that the Marwari custom referred to in the plaint as declared in the rules of the Marwari Association is that " in case of a hundi coming in any fraudulent way if the party receiving the amount of the hundi receives it as a Shah, he is absolved from liability if he traces the hundi to its source. But if he does not do so, he must re-pay the amount of the hundi with interest."

According to the statement in the plaint, the fraudulent way here referred to covers not only the case of a forged but also of a stolen or lost genuine hundi. To the same effect is the plaintiff's deposition. The first issue raised was whether the hundi in question was paid on the responsibility of the first defendant as a Shah and in accordance with the custom alleged.

The plaintiff with reference to this issue deposed that he did not know the writer Ramlal or the firm of Munalal Gayaprasad and if he had not got the railway receipt, he would not have paid the hundi. He only paid on the hundi and another hundi presented by another firm of Shroffs up to ninety per cent. of the value of the goods. He paid the defendant's hundi in full and the other in part. He received Rs. 5,600 for the railway receipt from Kilachand before he paid the defendants. The learned Judge, however, disposed of the first issue by saying: "The Shah does not guarantee the solvency of the drawer, he guarantees the genuineness of the hundi. A drawee will not pay a hundi unless he has funds in his hands belonging to the drawer, or is willing to give him credit. And he will not pay on presentation of a Shah Jog Hundi to a Shah unless he is satisfied as to the respectability of the Shah, as he looks to him in case of anything afterwards going wrong with the hundis: see Davlatram Shriram v. Bulakidas Khemchand (1). Therefore this issue is somewhat meaningless." We are unable to accept this view, which was also pressed upon us by the appellant's Counsel. In the case decided by Sir Joseph Arnould it was common ground that if payment were made to a Shah as such on a hundi which afterwards turned out to be stolen or lost, the drawee who has paid is entitled to a refund from the Shah to whom it has been mistakenly paid (unless he otherwise discharges himself in the customary way). Sir Joseph Arnould says at page 29: "It seems to me that this evidence strongly tends to show that the drawee of the hundi, in accepting and paying it, looks very mainly to the Shah as responsible in case of anything afterwards going wrong with the hundi and that he relies on the solvency and respectability of the Shah as one of the principal grounds in inducing him to make payment without further inquiry."

But in the case of a lost or stolen hundi, the hundi is ex hypothesi genuine, therefore the liability of a Shah who is paid does not rest on a guarantee of genuineness. The liability of a holder who endorses a bill of exchange and passes it on under English Law is only that of a surety for the drawer and the acceptor, but his position does not involve any liability to the acceptor.

We find it difficult to say what is the idea underlying the Marwari custom. It is perhaps this: that of two innocent parties, the one nearest in the line of successive holders to the person who committed the fraud must find out the guilty party at the risk of otherwise having to recoup the innocent payer. In the present case, however, it appears to us that the first defendant was paid, not as a Shah, but as the indorsee for collection of a hundi purporting to be drawn against the security of a document representing 300 tons of linseed, for payment was in fact refused until the railway receipt came to hand and had been sold for cash and no more was paid to the holders of the hundis than the exact amount realised on the railway receipt. This is a state of affairs not dealt with or contemplated in Davaltram Shriram v. Bulakidas Khemchand (1). The rules of the Marwari Association, which have been put, in relate to cases where the party who receives the amount of the hundi receives it as a Shah. If the plaintiff simply paid on the security of the railway receipt he would have no equity to recover back the amount from the first defendant: see Leather v. Simpson (2) and Baxter v. Chapman (3).

Assuming, however, that there might be a liability imposed on the first defendant by reason of the payment to refund or to trace the hundi to its source, this would only be the case provided notice was given within a reasonable time of the discovery of the forgery, that is, provided the plaintiff lost no time in making this communication and claiming the refund: see Dalvatram Shriram v. Bulakidas Khemchand (1). The duty of the plaintiff cannot be put lower than this, although the Hindu Law merchant may not be so strict as to notice of dishonour as the English Law, as to which see Megraj Jagannath v. Gokaldas

Mathuradas (4). It is, however, quite clear that the plaintiff knew long before the end of August that the hundis and the forged railway receipt were part of a fraudulent scheme of kite-flying perpetrated by Kamlaprasad, the Station Master of Harpalpur, the owner of the second defendant's firm, yet no notice was given till the demand of refund on the 25th September to the plaintiff, who in his ignorance had continued to deal with and give credit in account to the second defendant firm up to the end of the Maru year. It was upon this ground that the lower Court dismissed the suit and we agree that it was a sufficient ground.

We are also of opinion that the hundi had been "traced to its source" within the meaning of the Marwari Association Rules before the first defendant received intimation of the fraud and that the second defendant's firm was in the circumstances "the person from whom the forged hundi was bought" within the contemplation of Sir Joseph Arnould's judgment. The learned Judge thinks, not because the second defendant only sent the hundi for collection to the first defendant, but as he gave credit in account for the proceeds he was in effect the buyer of the hundi: see Mulchand Joharimal v. Suganchand Shivdas (5).

If the first defendant was only the holder for collection of a hundi handed to him by the second defendant's firm who were the actual payee (and as it appears also the drawer), the second defendant's firm would be the proper defendants to proceed against: see London and River Plate Bank v. Bank of Liverpool (6).

We affirm the decree and dismiss the appeal with costs throughout, excluding however the costs of cross-objections other than that as to costs.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 564 OF 1911.

December 8, 1914.

Present:—Mr. Justice Ayling and Mr. Justice Tyabji.

GADIAN CHETTI (DIED) AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS Nos. 2 AND 3—APPELLANTS

versus

VEERAPPA CHETTI AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFF AND DEFENDANT No. 1—RESPONDENTS.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 2, 17, 21, 114—Consideration—Recital of consideration in document, evidentiary value of—Burden of proof, shifting of.

A recital of payment of consideration in a mortgage document is an admission by the mortgagor within the meaning of sections 17 and 21 of the Evidence Act and may be proved against a person claiming under him, though not a party to the document.

Brajeshwere Peshakar v. Budhanuddi, 6 C. 268 at p. 277; 7 C. L. R. 6; Manohar Singh v. Sumirta Kuar, 17 A. 428 at p. 430; A. W. N. (1895) 93; Ghurphekni v. Parmeshar Dayal Dubey, 5 C. L. J. 653; Bisheswar Dayal v. Hurbans Sahay, 6 C. L. J. 659; 3 M. L. T. 38, referred to.

Whether a specific piece of evidence is enough for discharging the burden of proof is a question primarily concerned with the weight to be given to that piece of evidence and is not a question of law.

Where each party has adduced evidence tending respectively to prove and disprove a fact in issue, the importance of burden of proof disappears almost entirely.

The mere proof of acknowledgment of receipt of consideration does not necessarily shift the burden of proof, or must not necessarily be taken as insufficient to shift the burden of proof.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Nagapatam, in Appeal Suit No. 933 of 1909, preferred against that of the District Munsif of Pattukotta, in Original Suit No. 41 of 1909.

Mr. T. Rangachariar, for the Appellants.

Dr. S. Swaminadhan, for the Respondents.

This appeal coming on for hearing on the 19th September 1913 and on the 7th and 8th December 1914, the Court delivered the following

JUDGMENT.—The only question involved in this appeal is whether the mortgage of the 9th August 1889 (Exhibit C in the case) in favour of the plaintiff is supported by consideration. Both the lower Courts have found that issue in the affirmative. But it has been argued before us on behalf of the appellants that the decisions of the lower Courts are erroneous in law.

Mr. Rangachariar argued, in the first instance, that the lower Courts erred in permitting the plaintiff to prove and rely upon the acknowledgment of receipt of consideration contained in Exhibit C, to which document the 2nd defendant was not a party. He relied upon Brajeshware Peshakar v. Budhanuddi (1); Manohar Singh v. Sumirta Kuar (2) Ghurphekni v. Purmeshar Dayal Dubey (3) and Bisheswar Dayal v. Harbans Sahay (4) which decisions, he contended, laid down that a recital of payment, though it may bind a party to the document containing the recital, will not be evidence against the appellant, because he was not a party to the document. We cannot accede to this argument. Sections 17 and 21 of the Evidence Act seem to us to provide for the point in question. An acknowledgment of receipt of consideration is, under the circumstances we are considering, clearly such a statement as is defined as an admission in section 17; and section 21 provides that an admission so defined is relevant and may be proved, not only as against the person who makes it, but also his representative-in-interest. Mr. Rangachariar could not deny that the appellant was a representative-in-interest of the person who made the admission. We, therefore, think that the lower Courts were right in permitting the acknowledgment to be proved as against the appellant.

The next point taken was that the lower Courts erred in shifting the burden of showing want of consideration on to the second defendant, after the acknowledgment of receipt of consideration contained in Exhibit C had been proved. Reliance was placed on Saluk Singh v. Ajudhya Pershad (5), where it is stated as follows:—"The burden of proof in such a case is primarily on the plaintiffs to establish payment of consideration, and as against the transferee who was no party to the bond and had no sufficient knowledge of the circumstances under which it was executed, that admission is of very little value, and, in our opinion, is insufficient to shift the burden of proof on to the defendant transferee." Did the learned Judges who decided that case intend to lay it down as a proposition of law that the burden of proving consideration can in no case be discharged and shifted merely by proof of the acknowledgment of receipt of consideration? We are not prepared to say that they intended to do so. But if they did, we must with deference express dissent from that proposition.

It seems to us that it is impossible to lay down in broad terms as a proposition of law that, after a person on whom the burden of proof lies has adduced any specific piece of evidence,—such as an acknowledgment of the receipt of consideration—the burden of proof is not shifted from him. Whether a specific piece of evidence is enough for discharging the burden of proof is a question primarily concerned with the weight to be given to that piece of evidence, and is not a question of law. In this connection it may not be out of place to point out, what has often been pointed out before, that where each party has adduced evidence tending respectively to prove and disprove a fact in issue, in such cases the importance of the incidence of the burden of proof disappears almost entirely. See Hall v. Venkatakrishna (6); Chaudhri Mohammad Mehdi Hasan Khan v Sri Mandir Das (7) cited in Kuram Krishnama Chariar v. Veeravelli Krishnama Chariar (8). It must seldom happen, especially in view of section 114 of the Evidence Act, that the acknowledgment of payment is the only matter which the Court can consider in coming to a conclusion whether or not consideration passed. Even if the proof of the recital is the only formal evidence adduced, the circumstances surrounding the transaction in question, the relationship of the parties to the suit and various other matters would affect the weight to be given to the acknowledgment. Hence, it may be that in some cases not only would proof of acknowledgment be sufficient to shift the burden, but would be held sufficient to counterbalance a great deal of other evidence produced against the contention that consideration passed, if such evidence does not favourably impress the Judge before whom it is tendered. On the other hand, the circumstances may be such as to make the Judge disinclined to attach any weight to the acknowledgment. It seems to us material in this connection to advert to section 3 of the Evidence Act, where it is stated when a fact should be said to be proved, disproved, or not proved, respectively :—

"A fact is said to be proved when, after considering the matters before it, the Court either believes it to exist, or considers its existence so probable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that it exists."

"A fact is said to be disproved when, after considering the matters before it, the Court either believes that it does not exist, or considers its non-existence so probable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that it does not exist."

"A fact is said not to be proved when it is neither proved nor disproved."

It is impossible, therefore, in our opinion, to state broadly either that the mere proof of acknowledgment or receipt of consideration must necessarily shift the burden of proof or must, if taken by itself, always necessarily be insufficient to so shift the burden of proof.

The second point taken on behalf of the appellants was that apart from the question of the burden of proof and even assuming that it rested on the defendants, on the facts found by the learned Subordinate Judge, the irresistible legal inference was that no consideration had passed.

In order to consider this second point it is necessary to state the main facts connected with the transaction which is the subject-matter of the appeal. One Dorasami Thevan was at one time indebted to a firm which consisted apparently of three partners :—

(1) The 2nd defendant.

(2) One Chidambaram Chetty, who was the father-in-law of the plaintiff and who for the purposes of the present question may be considered to be identified in interest with the plaintiff.

(3) One Raman Chetty, with whom we are not directly concerned.

Exhibit C is a mortgage dated 9th August 1889 from Dorasami, the debtor of the firm, and purports to be executed for a consideration of Rs. 510, which sum is divided into two portions :—

(1) Rupees 35 thereof were purported to be paid in cash.

(2) Rupees 475 were stated to be outstanding from Dorasami to Chidambaram Chetty and the plaintiff agreed to pay off that sum.

Mr. Rangachariar attacked the existence of the latter portion of the consideration and argued

(1) that there were no debts due to Chidambaram Chetty at the time that Exhibit C was executed;

(2) that prior to the execution of Exhibit C the only debts due from Dorasami (the executant of Exhibit C) to any members of the firm were evidenced by Exhibits III, IV and V;

(3) that the debts under the said Exhibits had been paid off at the time when Exhibit C was executed and were found to be so paid off by the Subordinate Judge;

(4) that the 2nd defendant purchased whatever interest Chidambaram Chetty had in the said debts (see page 16, lines 35 to 37), so that as between Chidambaram Chetty (or the plaintiff) and the 2nd defendant there could not be any consideration for Exhibit C.

Shortly stated, therefore, Mr. Rangachariar's argument is that the only debts that could have formed the consideration for Exhibit C were, and have been found to be, non-existent and, therefore, there is no consideration for Exhibit C.

We think that so far as the debts evidenced by Exhibits III, IV and V are concerned, this contention is right. It remains to consider whether those were the only debts proved or alleged to be existing. It is argued that they were and that that fact is established because,

(1) according to the case of both parties there was a settlement of accounts not many months before Exhibit C was executed, and in this account all the debts due from Dorasami must have been included and consolidated.

(2) Exhibit VIII, which was executed in favour of the 2nd defendant after the settlement of accounts but before Exhibit C, was in consideration of the shares due both to the 2nd defendant and to Chidambaram Chetty out of the debts outstanding against Dorasami. Exhibit VIII is the only document in favour of 2nd defendant. If there had been debts other than those referred to in Exhibit VIII for payment off of the 2nd defendant's share in those debts, there would have been a document in favour of the 2nd defendant corresponding to the document Exhibit C, which is in favour of the plaintiff.

(3) Exhibit C following Exhibit VIII purports to be in consideration of Chidambaram Chetty's share in the debts which very share was the consideration for Exhibit C.

(4) Exhibit VIII specifically mentions Exhibits III, IV, V as being evidence of the debts due from Dorasami, but Exhibit C does not particularise any debts.

It is clear, however, that Dorasami Thevan was deeply indebted to the firm of which the 2nd defendant was a partner and also that the documents he was willing to pass are not necessarily in exact accordance with the facts. It would not be safe to say that because these debts evidenced by Exhibits III, IV and V were non-existent, there were no other debts which could have been the consideration for Exhibit C.

Hence it was open to the lower Courts to find one of these sets of circumstances :—

(a) that as a matter of fact there were other debts which might have been the consideration for Exhibit C ;

(b) that the plaintiff paid consideration for Exhibit C and that as between him and Chidambaram there being consideration, the 2nd defendant could not urge that Exhibit C was without consideration ; and

(c) that the plaintiff by his conduct had either

(i) estopped himself from questioning the fact that there was consideration for Exhibit C, or

(ii) at least furnished evidence on which there might be a finding against him.

The Subordinate Judge refers to some of these matters in paragraphs 8 and 9 of his judgment. They are, however, not quite easy to follow. He certainly seems to have misappreciated the significance of the prior events. For so far as the partnership suit, Original Suit No. 16 of 1890, is concerned, the plaintiff was not a party to it. The proceedings in that suit could not avail the plaintiff, unless it had been found that at that time the appellant before us had obtained a decree against Chidambaram on the basis of Exhibit C being for consideration, and that the amount that Chidambaram was ordered to pay to the 2nd defendant in that suit was on this basis. There is no finding to that effect.

Secondly, as to the novatio to which the Subordinate Judge refers, it is difficult to understand his meaning.

Finally, as to the execution proceedings referred to in paragraph 9 of his judgment, the fact that the appellant attached Exhibit C as if it were an asset does not amount to an admission, still less estoppel, as regards the validity or enforceability of the transaction referred to.

Mr. Rangachariar, therefore, asks us to send the case down for a finding on the point whether as a matter of fact the plaintiff made any payment to Chidambaram, his father-in-law, in consideration of Exhibit C. The Munsif has found that there was such payment. The Subordinate Judge has not dealt with this point. We have thought it better to hear Mr. Rangachariar on the question and to find on it ourselves instead of calling for a finding.

The evidence on the point is that of the plaintiff himself, who was called as defendants' witness No. 1. His examination-in-chief is, therefore, in the nature of cross-examination. In spite of this the Munsif who heard him give evidence believed his evidence, and in the circumstances of this case it seems to us that it would not be justifiable for us to arrive at a different conclusion. It may be added that with reference to part of the consideration for Exhibit C, consisting of Rs. 35 paid in cash, Mr. Rangachariar concedes that a decree might and ought to be passed against him.

Taking all the circumstances together, it seems to us that the lower Courts were right in proceeding on the basis that there was consideration for Exhibit C and in passing a decree on that footing.

The second appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Held, that she was in possession of the properties adversely to the agnates of her deceased father and that their suit was barred by limitation.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the learned District Judge of Birbhum, dated the 30th March 1910, dismissing an appeal from the judgment of the Munsif, dated 31st March 1911. The suit was brought to recover possession of certain moveable and immoveable properties by the agnates of one Shiban Chuckerbutty, who died many many years ago, leaving his widow and a daughter who, for the purposes of this case we must assume, was a widowed daughter who was also sonless. On the facts as found by the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court, after the death of the widow, the daughter succeeded to the properties and the only question that we have got to consider in this case is, whether the plaintiff's suit is barred by limitation. The determination of that question depends on the question as to whether the daughter of Shiban Chuckerbutty, that is Sri Sundari, took the properties as the heiress of her father or whether she was in possession of them adversely against the heirs. The point has been argued with considerable force by the learned Vakil for the appellants and, notwithstanding these arguments, I remain unconvinced that, according to the Hindu Law, a sonless widow is an heir. The arguments put forward by the learned Vakil are rather for the reformer than for the Law Courts. The matter can be based chiefly on the construction of the Hindu Widows' Re-marriage Act XV of 1856. Section 4 of the Act may be of some importance, because it expressly excepts a widow marrying again from succeeding to any property which before the passing of the Act she would have been incapable of inheriting by reason of her being a childless widow. It is quite true that Sri Sundari was not childless but only sonless. There is nothing, however, to show that Sri Sundari ever did marry again and if she has not married again, she is governed by the rules applicable to the other Hindus. It cannot be suggested, notwithstanding the statements in the text-books, that in an ordinary case of Hindu succession a sonless widow is an heir. In my opinion, the present appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

RICHARDSON, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.

BAILLIE, S. M. (April 16th, 1914).—The appellant in this case is the lambardar of the mahal. He was sued in the Civil Courts by the respondent for possession of a 9-anna 8-pie patti and in 1911 a decree for possession was given against him, but it was stated as regards mesne profits that respondent should proceed by way of suit against the lambardar in the Revenue Court. Subsequently to this decision the lambardar, appellant, continued to collect the rents in the land of which possession had been given to the respondent by the Civil Court decree, and on the 1st August 1912 he got a decree in his favour for arrears of rent due from certain tenants. The Commissioner states that appellant retained cultivating possession after the Civil Court decree. There appears to be on record nothing whatsoever to support this finding. Appellant is not himself in possession but he collects the rent from the tenants who are in possession. The case appears to me to be one in which section 127 is entirely inapplicable. Respondents' remedy is in the Civil Courts.

I would allow this appeal, cancel the notice of ejectment, but in the circumstances, as appellant appears to be adopting a position in defiance of the Civil Court's finding, I allow costs in any proceedings in this case.

TWEEDY, J. M.—I concur. The findings of the lower Courts seem to me most extraordinary.

SINNASAMI GOUNDEN v. SUBBANA GOUNDEN.

JUDGMENT.—The defendants in the suit form which this second appeal arises form an undivided Hindu family, the 4th defendant being the father and defendants Nos. 1 to 3 his sons. The plaintiff, as purchaser under a registered sale-deed of the share of the 1st defendant in the moveable and immoveable properties belonging to the joint family, sued for partition and delivery of the 1st defendant's share therein with mesne profits. The suit was dismissed by the District Munsif, but succeeded on appeal to the Subordinate Judge. The defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 are the appellants before us.

It is common ground that the 1st defendant executed to his father (the 4th defendant) the agreement Exhibit I, dated 10th November 1894, by which in consideration of the fact that 13½ acres of land were assigned to the 1st defendant by his father for maintenance without powers of alienation as well as cattle, sheep and other moveables absolutely for his share, the 1st defendant agreed not to demand partition of the family properties, except as regards the moveables already given to him, during the life-time of his father and of his step-mother, that is, the mother of defendants Nos. 2 and 3. It is found by the District Munsif (and the Subordinate Judge adopts the findings) that the 1st defendant only enjoyed the property assigned to him by Exhibit I for one year and that then, having squandered all the moveable property he got by Exhibit I, he demanded a share in the family property but was refused by the 4th defendant, his father, who drove him out of the family and thereafter refused to give him any maintenance whatever. This was in 1895. From that time onwards (a period of over 13 years before the suit was brought) the 1st defendant has lived away from his family maintaining himself by keeping a pial school and doing cooly work, and has not enjoyed or been maintained out of any of the family property. The 4th defendant appears to have recovered possession even of the land assigned to the 1st defendant by Exhibit I in 1895. The plaintiff, who is the cousin of the 1st defendant, admits that the 1st defendant demanded a share in the family property but was refused. He, however, tried to show that this occurred in 1903, but the lower Courts have not accepted that version.

The sale-deed upon which the suit is based is dated 30th September 1908. As the plaintiff's father and brother had attested Exhibit I and plaintiff is the 1st defendant's cousin, the District Munsif held that the plaintiff was fully aware of the existence of Exhibit I. In view of this and upon the construction of Exhibit I, he concluded that the agreement was binding both on the 1st defendant and the plaintiff and that, therefore, the suit was not maintainable during the life-time of the 4th defendant and his wife, having regard to the terms of the document. The District Munsif further held that the refusal of the 4th defendant to grant the 1st defendant's request for partition in 1895 and the subsequent facts amounted to an exclusion of the 1st defendant from possession of the joint family property to the knowledge of the 1st defendant and that, therefore, the suit was barred by limitation, having been brought more than twelve years from the date of exclusion. The Subordinate Judge, on the other hand, held that Exhibit I, being devoid of consideration, was not binding either on the 1st defendant or the plaintiff and that the 4th defendant's refusal of partition was not meant to exclude the 1st defendant from a share, but merely to prevent him squandering it and that, therefore, there was no bar by limitation on the ground of the 1st defendant's exclusion. The appellants attack these conclusions of the Subordinate Judge. It is, however, unnecessary to deal with the contentions of the appellants upon the first point, namely, as to the validity and binding effect of Exhibit I, as we are clear that upon the second point the conclusion of the Subordinate Judge cannot be upheld. The finding is that the 1st defendant was not only refused partition in 1895 but also that from that date he has not been in possession nor received any of the proceeds of the joint family property. The 1st defendant was thus excluded from the joint property [see Jaganatha v. Ramabhadra (1)]. It was not merely a case of non-participation, as it is found that the 4th defendant refused the 1st defendant even maintenance subsequently. The view of the Subordinate Judge that the refusal of the 4th defendant was not meant to exclude the 1st defendant from his share but merely to prevent his squandering it, is not based on any evidence. On the other hand, the facts that the 4th defendant took back the piece of land assigned to the 1st defendant and subsequently refused to allow the 1st defendant any maintenance whatever tend to show that exclusion was intended. The defendants have nowhere conceded (as the Subordinate Judge erroneously observes) that the 1st defendant has not lost his right to a share. The Subordinate Judge relies on Exhibit I as containing an admission of the 1st defendant's right to a share, but Exhibit I does not prevent the defendants Nos. 2 to 4 from proving, as they have done, that the 1st defendant was subsequently excluded.

In these circumstances, it lay upon the plaintiff who bought the 1st defendant's share when the 1st defendant was out of possession, to show that he brought the suit within 12 years from the date on which the 1st defendant was excluded from the joint family property, whether the Article applicable is Article 136 or 144 of the Limitation Act [see Ram Lakhi v. Durga Charan Sen (2)] As to this the lower Courts have rejected plaintiff's version that the 1st defendant was refused partition only in 1903, and have found that the exclusion of the 1st defendant dated from 1895. The suit is, therefore, barred by limitation.

The decree of the Subordinate Judge is reversed and that of the District Munsif restored with costs here and in the lower Appellate Court.

Appeal allowed; Suit dismissed.

Mussalmans Wakf Validating Act (VI of 1913), retrospective effect of.

The Mussalman Wakf Validating Act, 1913, refers solely to wakfs created after the Act and has no retrospective effect.

Messrs. Mulla and Mirza, for the Plaintiff and defendants Nos. 1 and 2.

Mr. Jardine, Acting Advocate-General, for Defendant No. 3.

JUDGMENT.—One Shaik Abdulla bin Shaik Ebrahim, a Sunni Muhammadan, died at Bombay on or about the 14th of August 1906, leaving him surviving as his only heirs according to Muhammadan Law two daughters, Amirbibi and Azizabibi. By a deed-poll dated the 23rd March 1901 the said Shaik Abdulla declared in effect that he held certain property belonging to him in Huzaria Street in wakf as a mutawali or trustee upon the trusts following, viz. :—

"(a) Out of the net rents of the said property to feed five Fakirs every Friday night, to pay for reading the Koran every month and for Fatiha ceremonies in the months of Muharram, Rabiulakhar, Rajab and Ramzan and for offering every month oil two and a half seers for lighting the Masjid situated in Huzaria Street.

"(b) To pay the balance of the said rents to his daughters and any other child that might thereafter be born to the settlor in equal shares for their maintenance and the maintenance of their children therein named, and after the death of his daughters to pay the same to the second defendant and the said Yakubkhan and Dawoodkhan and their descendants generation after generation as well as the settlor's descendants, male or female, generation after generation.

"(c) On failure of descendants to use the balance of the said rents for the benefit of the settlor's community or for meritorious acts or for the use of the said Masjid as the trustee for the time being might think proper."

The annual gross income of the property is said to be Rs. 960 and the annual net income about Rs. 800. The amount required for the purposes set forth in sub-clause (a) of paragraph 2 of the plaint is said to be about Rs. 64.

The plaintiff as one of the daughters of the deceased, has filed this suit against her sister and her sister's son and the Advocate-General, praying that it may be declared that the said deed-poll is void and of no effect and that the plaintiff and the first defendant as the sole heirs of the said Shaik Abdulla are absolutely entitled to the said immoveable property.

The deceased had executed a similar deed-poll in respect of another property on the same day and that deed-poll was the subject-matter of Suit No. 857 of 1911, in which a decree was passed on the 13th February 1912 by Mr. Justice Beaman, by which it was declared that the deed of settlement mentioned in the plaint was null and void except as regards the charities mentioned in Exhibit B to the plaint. The decree further ordered that plaintiff and the first defendant should invest a certain sum to provide for those charitable purposes, and declared that when they had so done they would be absolutely entitled to the immoveable property mentioned in the deed.

It cannot be doubted that under the decisions of the Privy Council, the deed in this suit would have to be declared to be void except as regards the charities mentioned in sub-clause (a) of paragraph 2 of the plaint. But it has been contended that those decisions no longer apply now that the Mussalmans Wakf Validating Act, VI of 1913. has been passed. It is argued that the effect of that Act is retrospective and that all deeds of wakfs hitherto created which might be declared void and of no effect, if brought before the Courts, are now made good, and there is some ground for that argument in the preamble of the Act. But there is a distinct conflict between the preamble of the Act and the Act itself. The preamble runs as follows :—

"Whereas doubts have arisen regarding the validity of wakfs created by persons professing the Mussalman faith in favour of themselves, their families, children and descendants and ultimately for the benefit of the poor or for other religious, pious or charitable purposes; and whereas it is expedient to remove such doubts; It is hereby enacted—"

A preamble sets forth the reason for the particular Act of the Legislature and foreshadows what is intended to be effected by the Act. But to see what has been actually effected by the Act, one must look to the Act itself; and the Act seems to have failed entirely to produce the effect which, it might be gathered from the preamble, was intended, that is to say, intended according to the construction put upon it by the Advocate-General. The word "created" in the preamble might be read as including, not only wakfs to be created in the future, but also wakfs already created in the past. It may have been the intention to validate all wakfs which could be set aside under the previous decisions of the Privy Council when they came before the Courts, or it may have been intended that if such wakfs were created in future, they would under the Act be held good. These are the alternative constructions which can be applied to the preamble. Then turning to the Act itself, it curiously enough does not provide, as is usually the case, for the date on which the Act shall come into force. Therefore I presume the Act came into force on the day it received the assent of the Governor-General in Council. The Act refers solely to wakfs which shall be created in the future. Section 3 says: "It shall be lawful for any person professing the Mussalman faith to create a wakf which in all other respects is in accordance with the provisions of Mussalman Law, for the following among other purposes:—"

There is nothing in the Act about wakfs which are already in existence when the Act was passed, and there is nothing in the Act which enables me to hold that the provisions of the Act shall apply to such wakfs; and, therefore, in my opinion whatever the intention of the Legislature may have been, it has by this Act only enabled Muhammadans in future to create wakfs by deeds which, under the previous decisions, would be liable to be set aside as contrary to the provisions of Mussalman law, and, therefore, as regards this wakf which was created in March 1901, the old law applies. As the deed is clearly intended to effect a permanent settlement of the property on the settlor's descendants and the ultimate gift to charity is purely illusory, the deed must be set aside except as regards the charities referred to above which can be given effect to.

It has been arranged between the Advocate-General on the one hand and the plaintiff and the defendants on the other hand that Government promissory notes of the nominal value of Rs. 2,400 should be purchased and should be settled in trust to provide for those charitable purposes. After that has been done, the property will be declared the absolute property of the plaintiff and the first defendant.

Costs will come out of the settled property, those of the third defendant as between attorney and client.

Deed set aside.

Enhancement of rent, suit for—Rent unvaried for 20 years before suit—Bengal Rent Act (X of 1859), s. 16—Presumption, how displaced—Tenure appertaining to endowment—Government sanction, whether necessary for suit for enhancement of rent.

Where it is found as a fact that a tenure, though held at a rent which has not been varied for a period of 20 years before suit, came into existence for the first time long after the date of the Permanent Settlement, the presumption provided for in section 16 of Act X of 1859 is displaced and the tenure is liable to an enhancement of rent.

The mere fact that the tenure appertains to a public endowment of which the beneficiary is a Thakur, does not make Government sanction necessary for maintaining a suit for alteration of rent.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Cuttack, dated 9th January 1912, affirming that of the Deputy Collector, Puri, dated 22nd April 1911.

Babus Pravas Chandra Mitra and Susil Madhab Mallik, for the Appellants.

Babus Bepin Behary Ghose and Suresh Chandra Chakravarty, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

JENKINS, C. J.—This is an appeal from the decree of the District Judge of Cuttack who has affirmed the decision of the Deputy Collector of Puri.

The purpose of the suit is to obtain an enhancement of rent. The defendants, who are tenure-holders, resist the claim, and their resistence is mainly based upon the presumption for which provision is made in section 16 of Act X 1859. It is provided by that section that "whenever in any suit under the Act it shall be proved that the rent at which a talook or other tenure is held in the Provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa and Benares has not been changed for a period of twenty years before the commencement of the suit, it shall be presumed that such talook or tenure has been held at that rent from the time of Permanent Settlement, unless the contrary be shown, or it be proved that such rent was fixed at some later period." The importance of the presumption is that it brings into play section 15 of the Act, which provides that no person possessing a permanent transferable interest in land, intermediate between the proprietor of an estate and the raiyat who holds his talook or tenure at a fixed rent which has not been changed from the time of the Permament Settlement, shall be liable to any enhancement of such rent. It is proved in this case that the rent at which the tenure is held has not been changed for a period of twenty years before the commencement of the suit. Therefore, it is argued, it is not liable to enhancement.

Both Courts have decided against the defendants.

The judgment of the Court of first instance placed the matter beyond the possibility of argument, if it is correct, because it holds there was a variation of rent.

The lower Appellate Court, notwithstanding the antiquity of the documents on which the Judge in the first Court based that conclusion, was not satisfied with this evidence, but he came to the same conclusion as to the rent being liable to enhancement, on the ground that it had been shown that the tenure was not held from the time of the Permanent Settlement at the rent now payable. The date of the Permanent Settlement for this purpose is 1793, and the finding of the lower Appellate Court is on the facts of this case—and the finding must of necessity be limited to the facts of this case—that the predecessors of the defendants had not any interest in the land prior to 1848, and that before that they were mere rent-collectors. This is to my mind the only interpretation to be placed on the relevant passages of the judgment of the District Judge. Though that judgment may be open to the verbal criticism which has been directed against them, I think we should not be giving fair effect to it if we do not come to the conclusion that the learned Judge held, as a matter of fact, that the tenure with which he was concerned in this case was one which came into existence for the first time long after 1793. If that be a correct conclusion, then the presumption of section 16 of Act X of 1859 is displaced.

We have been pressed with the fact that the defendants in this case are described not only as Sarbarakars but as Padhani Sarbarakars. An early judgment which has been brought to our notice seems to express some doubt as to how the qualification Padhani came to be added. But, however that may be, we have only to deal with the particular tenure in this case, and anything that we say can in no way affect Padhani tenures generally. All we lay down is that the final Judge of fact in this case has come to a conclusion of fact, binding on us, that the particular tenure with which we are here concerned came into existence at a time which negatives the presumption for which section 16 makes provision. And it is on that and that ground alone that we affirm the decision of that learned Judge. In so saying I do not overlook the arguement placed upon the alleged settlement of rent under Chapter X of the Bengal Tenancy Act. But the appellants' own grounds of appeal show that the amount of rent was not called in question, and it is impossible for us to say that this suit is barred by anything that occurred in the proceedings under Chapter X. Nor do I think that there is any real force in the argument that the rent cannot be altered without Government sanction, because we have here a finding that the Thakur is in fact the zemindar. The findings of fact which are conclusive on us appear to me to require a determination of this appeal adverse to the appellant, and we must confirm the decree with costs.

N. CHATTERJEA, J.—I agree.

Jurisdiction—Small Cause Court—Suit to recover amount paid by purchaser for incumbrance on property represented free from incumbrance—Compensation—Contribution.

A suit to recover an amount which the plaintiff had to pay in respect of a property purchased by him from the defendant in consequence of the latter having falsely represented the property to be free from the incumbrance which the plaintiffs had to discharge, is a suit for compensation and not one for contribution and is, therefore, cognizable in a Court of Small Causes.

Civil revision from an order of the Judge of the Court of Small Causes of Basti.

Mr. Sheo Dihal Sinha, for the Appellants.

Mr. Pearey Lal Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application praying that the decree of the Court of Small Causes at Basti be set aside, on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. It is urged that the suit was one for contribution and not for damages, as held by the Court below. I think that the view taken by that Court is right. The facts are these. The predecessors-in-title of the applicants, who were defendants in the Court below, sold to the predecessor-in-title of the plaintiffs, opposite party, certain property, and in the sale-deed they specified certain incumbrances on the property and stated that there were no other incumbrances. The sale-deed contained an indemnity clause in the event of other incumbrances being discovered. As a matter of fact the property sold and some other property of the vendor were subject to a mortgage, which the mortgagee sought to enforce by suit. He obtained a decree. In order to avoid a sale of the property purchased by the plaintiffs, they discharged the decree, and they brought the suit, out of which this application arises, to be reimbursed the amount which they had to pay in respect of the property purchased by them. This was clearly not a suit for contribution. If they had paid the amount for which the other property not sold to them was rateably liable in excess of the amount for which the property purchased by them was liable, they could have sued for contribution; and if they had brought such a suit, that would have been a suit which could not be maintained in a Court of Small Causes; but the present suit was not of that description. The plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendants the amount which they had to pay in respect of the property purchased by them in consequence of the defendants having falsely represented the property to be free from the incumbrance which the plaintiffs had to discharge. It was clearly a suit for compensation and not one for contribution and was, therefore, cognizable in a Court of Small Causes. I dismiss the application with costs.

Hindu Law—Son—Co-parcener by birth—Will by father without son's consent invalid—Gift by widow.

Directly a son is born to a Hindu in possession of an ancestral house, he becomes a co-parcener in the house, and the father cannot make a Will declaring who is to succeed to the property after the son's death without the consent of the latter.

A Hindu widow has merely a life-interest in the property left by her husband and, therefore, cannot make a valid gift of it without the consent of her reversioners.

Second appeal from the decree of the Divisional Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 27th May 1912, reversing that of the District Judge, Jhelum, dated the 8th February 1912, dismissing the claim.

Rai Bahadur Pandit Sheo Narain and Mehta Bahadur Chand, for the Hon'ble Mr. Shadi Lal, R. B., for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, K. B., for all the Respondents save Jiwan Mal, who is represented by Bhagat Gobind Das.

JUDGMENT.—The suit out of which this appeal arises was brought by the plaintiffs-respondents, reversioners of Ralla Ram, deceased, for a declaration that an alleged gift of a residential house made in favour of Hakim Diwan Chand shall not affect their rights. The allegation on behalf of the defendants was that the gift was by way of sankalp and was made during the life-time of Hari Ram, minor son of Ralla Ram, for his spiritual benefit, the donee being a Brahmin. The first Court found that the alleged sankalp was not proved, but that there was an oral gift of the house by Musammat Parmeshri, widow of Ralla Ram, after the death of Hari Ram; that under a Will executed by Ralla Ram Musammat Parmeshri had full power to dispose of the house as she pleased and that the plaintiffs could not control her alienations. It, therefore, dismissed the suit. The lower Appellate Court agreed with the first Court that there had been no sankalp, and that as Hari Ram was born during the life-time of his father, he immediately on his birth acquired an interest in the house which was joint family property, that Ralla Ram had no power to dispose of it by Will to his prejdudice, that Musammat Parmeshri, therefore, could not rely upon the Will as giving her an absolute power of alienation, and that the gift made by her to Diwan Chand was invalid. It, therefore, gave the plaintiffs the decree claimed.

The defendants have filed a further appeal to this Court. Gopal Das, one of the plaintiffs-respondents, has died and no application has been made to bring his legal representatives on to the record. It is, however, admitted that he left no heirs except his co-plaintiffs who are already on the record, so no application is necessary. The first point urged by Pandit Sheo Narain on behalf of the appellants was that no issue was framed as to the date of birth of Hari Ram, who was alleged to be a posthumous son of Ralla Ram, and he asks that a further inquiry should be made into this point. We do not see any necessity for ordering further inquiry inasmuch as Musammat Parmeshri, mother of Hari Ram, herself admitted that the boy was five years old at the time of his father's death. She is siding with the defendants and there is no reason to disbelieve her statement on this point.

Pandit Sheo Narain next urges that the Will read as a whole shows that it was the intention of the testator that his property should in no case go to his reversioners, the plaintiffs, but should go to his son, if he had one, and after him to his mother and after her to his widow. We have carefully read the Will and are clearly of opinion that whatever may have been the intention of Ralla Ram, he did not in the Will declare that in the event of his son dying without heirs the property should pass to his mother. The property was only to go to Ralla Ram's mother in case no son was born to Ralla Ram. Further, the lower Appellate Court is perfectly right in holding that directly Hari Ram was born, he became a co-parcener in the house in dispute and his father could not make a Will declaring who was to succeed to the property after Hari Ram's death without the consent of the latter. Even then if the Will can be read as meaning that the property was to pass to any one else after Hari Ram's death, it would be invalid to that extent.

Hari Ram having died without issue the property came into Musammat Parmeshri's hands and she, as a Hindu widow, had merely a life-interest in it and could not make a valid gift of it without the consent of her reversioners, the plaintiffs.

We, therefore, agree with the finding of the lower Appellate Court and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Agreement—Debt to be discharged in particular manner, whether waiver of other remedies—Family partnership—Nattukotta Chetties—Usage—Family property as trading assets—Signature—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 19—Acknowledgment

An agreement that the debt may be discharged in a certain manner does not show that the creditor has waived any other remedy which he may have.

Nattukottai Chetties are a trading community and they usually treat the family property as assets, making no distinction between their family property and their trade assets.

Therefore, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary their family properties should be treated as trade assets.

Where it is proved that the Nattukottai Chetties in writing their private letters do not usually sign their names, but only write words invoking the help of the family deity, a letter thus signed may be taken as signed by the writer for the purposes of section 19 of the Limitation Act.

A letter signed by the managing member of a family acknowledging a debt is binding on the family.

Appeal from the decree of the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Ramnad at Madura, in Original Suit No. 168 of 1910.

Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar, for the Appellants.

Messrs. T. Rangachariar, V. Narasimha Aiyangar and M. Narayanasami Aiyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The suit was brought by the plaintiffs, the members of S. R. M. A. R. firm, against the defendants, members of the M. P. M. R. firm, for the recovery of Rs. 24,036-0-6 due to the plaintiffs on account of dealings between them. Both of them are money-lenders. The Subordinate Judge has passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs. Against this decree the defendants Nos. 1, 3 and 4 appeal. The first objection taken is that on the facts set out in the plaint the suit is not maintainable. There is an allegation in the plaint that any amount payable by the defendants should be made good out of the money deposited by R.M.R. M. firm with the plaintiffs through and to the order of one Chokkalingam Chetti, who was a member both of the defendants' firm and that of said R. M. R. M. firm. As to this, it is sufficient to say that no discharge is either allowed by the plaintiffs or by the defendants. An agreement that the debt due may be discharged in a certain manner does not show that the plaintiffs waived any other remedy which they might have. The plaintiff's case is that he has not been able to realize the debt in accordance with the agreement. On the other hand, Chokkalingam Chetti himself has fraudulently taken steps to deprive him of that money. The defendants do not allege that the plaintiff has been guilty of any bad faith, and it is found in Original Suit No. 157 which was heard about the same time that no such agreement had been proved. We, therefore, disallow this contention.

It is then argued that the plaintiff has failed to prove the debt. The plaintiff's account books show that the debt claimed is due. The second witness swears that the entries in the account books A to C are true entries of the transactions that really took place. They open with a debit entry of Rs. 45,154-7-3 against the defendants. It is argued that there is no evidence that this amount is really due, as the accounts which give the details as to how this sum was made up have not been filed. But the same witness proves that it was the 6th defendant, one of the managing partners of the defendants' firm, who directed him to debit this amount as due by the defendants' firm.

We hold, therefore, that the plaintiffs' accounts are corroborated and their claim is proved. It is next argued that defendants Nos. 2 to 5 are not partners and that the decree that has been passed in favour of the plaintiff to recover the sum due from the second defendant personally along with others and from the family properties of the defendants is wrong, because it is only their share in the assets of the firm of M. P. M. R. that should have been made liable. Though no doubt the witnesses do not state in so may terms that the sons of the 1st defendant are partners, their evidence is clear that the firm M. P. M. R. was a money-lending business carried on by the 1st defendant's family of which the defendants Nos. 3, 4 and 5 are members and another family represented by the 6th to 8th defendants. It was not alleged by the plaintiffs in the lower Court that it was only a certain portion of the property belonging to the 1st defendant's family that was set apart for this business.

There is no issue raising that question and looking to the usual course of practice in such cases, we have no doubt that in the case of these Nattukottai Chetties their family properties should be treated as trade assets. They are a trading community and they usually treat the family property as assets, making no distinction between their family property and their trade assets. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we accept the finding of the Subordinate Judge which is also supported by the evidence of the witnesses.

The next contention is that the suit is barred by limitation. It is argued that the Exhibits E and E2, which acknowledge the defendants' liability, are not proved or signed by the 1st defendant and it is also argued that the 1st defendant is not a person authorised by the others to acknowledge the liability of the firm. The letter purports to be written by Chidambaram (1st defendant) and it ends with the words "Murugan Thunai".

The genuineness of these letters was not denied in the written statement, though it is not expressly admitted. The plaintiffs' 2nd witness swears that they are the 1st defendant's letters. The 1st defendant did not go into the witness box to deny them. We accordingly accept them as genuine. It is in evidence that the Nattukottai Chetties in writting their private letters do not usually sign their names, but only write words similar to those given above which are words invoking the help of a deity. The particular deity whose name is given indicates the family, as it is the family god that is always invoked. At the top of the letter the writer's own name is given. In these circumstances we accept the evidence that these words at the end of the letter are intended for the signature of the writer. We, therefore, hold that these letters are signed by the 1st defendant.

Whether these letters by the 1st defendant as a partner will bind the other partners is a question which is unnecessary to determine in this case; because he is the managing member of the family to which the appellants belong and his acknowledgment is, therefore, binding on them.

For these reasons we dismiss the appeal with costs.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 1302 OF 1912.

Mortgage—Consideration, receipt of—Admission before Sub-Registrar—Burden of proof—Mortgage with possession—Lease by one of two mortgagors only—Mortgage-deed mentioning liability of both mortgagors for rent—Agreement without consideration—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXIV, r. 4.

Where a mortgagor disputes the receipt of a portion of the mortgage-money, which he has, however, admitted before the Sub-Registrar to have been due by him on book account, the onus lies upon him to show that the consideration did not pass in full.

A and B mortgaged certain properties with possession and on the same day that the mortgage-deed was executed, A took the mortgaged properties on lease from the mortgagee under a registered lease. The mortgage-deed made the rent a charge upon the mortgaged properties:

Held, that the agreement by B in the mortgage-deed to pay the rent was without consideration, and hence B was not liable to pay it, nor was his property under mortgage liable for any sums beyond the principal mortgage-money.

In framing mortgage decrees, Order XXXIV, rule 4 of the Civil Procedure Code should not be overlooked.

First appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Delhi, dated the 22nd of April 1912, decreeing plaintiffs' claim.

Mr. H. Beechey, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Raj Narain, Santanam and Lala Moti Sagar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The suit out of which this appeal arises was brought by the plaintiffs for recovery of Rs. 69,346-8-0, on the basis of a mortgage-deed purporting to be executed on the 3rd of May 1903 by Kishen Chand, defendant No. 1, and his deceased mother, Musammat Bibi Sundar, for Rs. 50,000. The District Judge decreed the plaintiffs' claim in full and defendants, namely, Kishen Chand and Musammat Chambeli, wife of Kishen Chand, have appealed.

The facts of the case have been very clearly and fully set forth in the judgment of the Court below and it is unnecessary for us to repeat them. Musammat Chambeli derives her interest in part of the property mortgaged under a Will executed by Musammat Bibi Sundar on the 14th November 1904. The affairs of Kishen Chand's family and the question of this Will have been fully discussed in the judgment of this Court, dated the 31s of January 1911, in Civil Appeal No. 505 of 1910 [Musammat Chembeli v. National Bank of India Ld. (1)]. The final result of that case was the decision that Musammat Chambeli was entitled to three properties bought by Kishen Chand in the name of his mother by deed dated the 29th of August 1898 and left to Musammat Chambeli by Musammat Bibi Sundar in her Will. The main point urged by Mr. Beechey in arguing the case for the appellants was that Musammat Bibi Sundar received no consideration for the mortgage and did not execute the deed after understanding its contents and that Musammat Chambeli is, therefore, not bound by the terms of the deed so far as the property bequeathed to her, which was bought on the 29th of August 1898, is concerned. Mr. Beechey urges that Musammat Bibi Sundar having been a pardah-nashin lady, it was necessary for the plaintiffs to prove very strictly that she understood the contents of the mortgage-deed and voluntarily executed it. Evidence has been produced to show that the deceased lady executed a general power-of-attorney (Exhibit P2), dated the 24th January 1903, in favour of her son, Kishen Chand, under which he had full power to raise money by alienating her property. Evidence has also been tendered to show that both Kishen Chand and Musammat Bibi Sundar executed the mortgage-deed and that Kishen Chand admitted execution at the time of registration. On referring to this evidence, we find that though Musammat Chambeli was represented by Counsel no attempt was made to shake the evidence of the witnesses on the question of the execution by Musammat Bibi Sundar either of the mortgage-deed or of the power-of-attorney. No questions were put to the witnesses with the object of showing that

Musammat Bibi Sundar did not understand the nature of the document which she was executing, and we find from the judgment of the lower Court that no arguments were advanced by the defendants' Counsel to the effect that the mortgage-deed had not been actually executed (see page 74, line 31, of the paper-book). The execution of the power-of-attorney is very clearly proved by the evidence of Ranjit Singh (P. W. No. 1) and Pandit Har Narain, Registration Moharrir (P. W. No. 2). The evidence is to the effect that the Registering Officer went to the house of Musammat Bibi Sundar and registered the document there. We see no reason whatever for disbelieving this evidence. Kishen Chand had, by deeds of the 29th August 1898 and 9th January 1902, purchased properties for the sum of Rs. 30,000 in the name of his mother. This Court in the previous case held that the purchase of 1898 was a bona fide one intended as a settlement in favour of the mother of Kishen Chand, whereas that of 1902 was made to defraud creditors. It is clear, however, that Kishen Chand was on the best of terms with his mother and there was, therefore, no reason why she should not execute a power-of-attorney in his favour. We hold, therefore, that the power-of-attorney (Exhibit P 2) was duly executed by the deceased lady. As regards the mortgage-deed sued upon, we have the evidence of Ranjit Singh (P. W. No. 1) which shows that Musammat Bibi Sundar's mark was obtained upon the deed. His evidence does not clearly show that she put her mark upon the deed in his presence, but we think he clearly meant to say this. He was not cross-examined on the point and the deed clearly shows that he was an attesting witness to it. He has also identified the signatures of Chuni Lal and Mul Chand deceased, who were attesting witnesses. Sohan Lal, plaintiff, has himself gone into the witness-box and has deposed that the lady duly executed the deed. We see no reason to doubt that she did execute it. It was never pleaded by Musammat Chambeli that Kishen Chand used undue influence or defrauded his mother by getting her to sign the deed under some false pretext. Under the power-of-attorney (Exhibit P 2) Kishen Chand had the power to execute the deed on behalf of his mother without getting her to attest it at all. There was, therefore, no necessity for him to concoct false evidence with the object of showing that she had herself personally executed it. We, therefore, agree with the lower Court that the execution of the deed of mortgage by both Kishen Chand and Musammat Bibi Sundar is duly proved.

In regard to consideration, the only item disputed before us is that of Rs. 3,565 out of a debt previously due to the plaintiffs. Having regard to the fact that Kishen Chand received the rest of the consideration in cash and admitted before the Sub-Registrar that this sum was due on book account, we hold that the onus was upon the defendants to show that the consideration did not pass in full. This they have not discharged. The lower Court has dealt with this item in detail and we agree with its conclusions.

The next point urged by Mr. Beechey is that plaintiffs are not entitled to charge interest upon the property mortgaged. The mortgage was with possession, but on the same day that the mortgage-deed was executed Kishen Chand took the mortgaged property on lease from the mortgagees under the registered lease (Exhibit P 3, page 21 et seq). Under this he agreed to pay Rs. 1,125 per quarter as rent. The mortgage-deed makes this rent a charge upon the property mortgaged. Reading the mortgage-deed by itself it appears that both the mortgagors agreed to pay this sum of rent or interest, but having regard to the fact that Kishen Chand was the sole lessee we are unable to agree with Mr. Raj Narain, Counsel for the respondents, that Musammat Bibi Sundar was liable to pay this sum. The agreement by her in the mortgagee-deed to pay it is without consideration. Mr. Raj Narain says that it was clearly the intention of the parties that both the mortgagors will be liable to pay this sum, but having regard to the clear terms of the lease, which is in the name of Kishen Chand alone, we are unable to agree with him. It is, therefore, clear that any property of Musammat Bibi Sundar which is included in the mortgage, is not liable for any sum beyond the principal mortgage-money.

Part of the property mortgaged (No. 8 is the list attached to the plaint) has been attached and sold in execution of decree proceedings and Rs. 20,670 has been paid to the plaintiffs' mortgagees. A calculation has shown that more than this amount was at the time due on account of interest or rent and there is no reason why the plaintiffs should not credit it to the interest.

Mr. Beechey has raised an objection as to the form of the decree. He points out that under Order XXXIV, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code, time should have been allowed to the defendants to pay the amount decreed into Court and that only on their failure to pay should the property be sold. Mr. Raj Narain has no objection to the decree being modified to this extent.

To sum up then, we find that the mortgage-deed was duly executed; that the amount claimed is due; and that Kishen Chand's property is liable for the whole sum claimed; but that the property mortgaged by Musammat Bibi Sundar, which has now come into the hands of Musammat Chambeli, defendant, is only liable to the extent of the principal sum of Rs. 15,000.

We, therefore, accept the appeal and modify the decree of the lower Court so far as to declare that Musammat Chambeli's property inherited by her from Musammat Bibi Sundar shall only be liable to the extent of the principal sum of Rs. 15,000 and costs in proportion. The decree will also be drawn up as laid down in Order XXXIV, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code, the period of six months being allowed for payment. In other respects the decree of the Court below is maintained. As appellants have only succeeded to a very limited extent, they must bear the plaintiffs-respondents' costs in this Court.

Counsel are not agreed as to which are the properties of Musammat Chambeli inherited from Musammat Bibi Sundar, and this question will have to be decided by the executing Court.

Appeal accepted.

BORA KARIMJI AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Partnership—Joint adventure—Dealing by individual—Firm, liability of—Bill, drawer of, discounting acceptance when acceptor owes nothing to him—Liability.

Where goods are purchased or money raised for a joint adventure, and the dealing though ostensibly by an individual is truly and substantially a dealing of the joint adventure, the adventurers are liable as partners. But there is no such responsibility for goods, etc., purchased on the credit of an individual adventurer previously to the contract, though afterwards brought into the joint stock as his contribution.

When a drawer of a bill discounts an acceptance given at a time when the acceptor owes no money to the drawer, the drawer does avail himself of the acceptor's credit.

Appeal from a judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at Bombay, dated the 17th of January 1910, reversing those of Mr. Justice Russell, dated the 13th of April 1909, of the same Court.

FACTS.—The action was brought by the appellant to recover a sum of Rs. 1,11,819-8-9 for moneys lent and advanced by him to the first and second respondents by means of acceptances by the appellant of certain hundis (or bills of exchange) drawn upon the appellant by the first and second respondents respectively and for commission, costs, charges and expenses due to the appellant from the said first and second respondents particulars whereof were annexed to the plaint. The third respondent was the Official Assignee in Bankruptcy and as such the assignee of the estate and effects of the second respondent's firm which had become bankrupt prior to the commencement of the action. The second and third respondents did not defend the action. The action was tried before Mr. Justise Russell who substantially gave judgment in favour of the appellant, but on appeal a Divisional Bench (Sir B. Scott, C. J., and Batchelor, J.) reversed the judgment appealed from. The appellant thereupon appealed to His Majesty in Council. The agreement which was in Gujarati between the first and second respondents, dated the 25th July 1906, and was referred to in their Lordships' judgment, was in terms the following:--

"To Wit:—We, the undersigned, Bora Karimji Jivanji and Co. and Khoja Rashid Alidina & Co. at present residing at Bombay, for the purpose of doing business in partnership in red (brown) Mauritius sugar, from Mauritius for China-Hong Kong, agree with each other, to act, according to the underwritten conditions. The particulars of the said, conditions, are as follows:—

"1. The people of Bora Ka. Ji. and Co. and the people of Ra. A. & Co. are jointly to purchase at Mauritius red (brown)sugar suitable for China-Hong Kong demand after consulting each other and paying (proper) attention to the intelligence, that may be sent, by us from Bombay. As to the quantity that may be purchased from time to time, each one of the two parties is to send to the other party, delivery order, on the Dock, in respect of the half (of that quantity) that is to say, the people of Bora Ka. Ji. and Co. are to send to Ra. A. & Co., delivery, (order) on the Dock in respect of exactly half the number of bastas (packages) which they may have purchased; and in the same manner the people of Ra. A. & Co. are to send to Bora Ka. Ji. & Co., delivery order, on the Dock in respect of exactly half the number of bastas (packages) which they may purchase. Neither of the two parties is to give (allow) a share to any person whatever in such sugar purchased on (the) partnership account.

"2. Both the parties are to buy the said red (brown) sugar. When a quantity sufficient to load a vessel with the consignment thereof is purchased, then both the parties, after consulting each other and also according to the intelligence (?) (received) from the Bombay (firms), are to charter any steamer whatever and having loaded thereon the sugar so purchased on the partnership (account) half and half (by each party), they, are to cause that steamber to sail for Hong Kong.

"3. Both the aforesaid parties are to ship the said red (brown) sugar without gunny bags, and also (they) are to ship (the packages thereof) without putting any mark on them. Each of the (two) parties is to prepare an invoice of the purchase (price) and charges, also including the expenses incurred, in respect of such number of bastas (packages) as (each party) may ship on board (the) steamer, and the representative, of Ra. A. & Co. is to send his invoice to its Bombay firm and, the representative, of Ka. Ji. & Co. is to send his invoice to its Bombay firm.

"4. As to the sugar which the above-mentioned (both the) parties may consign for Hong Kong per chartered steamer, against the vouchers thereof they are to write 'draw' Bombay hundi documents: (the representative) of Khoja R. A. & Co. is to write, draw hundis, on its Bombay firm; so also, the representative, of Bora Ka. Ji. & Co. is to write, draw hundis, on its Bombay firm. 'For the present so long as Bora Ka: Ji: & Co. have not opened their firm in Bombay so long' the said, Ka. Ji. & Co., are to write, draw documents, on our Hong Kong Agents, Khoja Karmali Abdulla & Co.'s Bombay firm, which is carried on in the name of Khoja Abdulla Alarkhia & Co. in respect of the sugar consigned through the said, firm. As to the Bombay, documents, hundis' against the steamer carrying sugar direct from Mauritius to Hong Kong, if the Banks of that place should refuse to receive ?accept those hundis, then we are to be informed of the same by wire, in Bombay. And immediately, after the receipt of such information, the people of Rashid Alidina & Co. and the people of Bora Karamji Jiwanji & Co. are to make arrangement here, with our Hong Kong Agent's firm and inform, the people at, Maurititus, about that arrangement, or are to send from Banks, ?letters of, 'credit' or having received half the amount from the firm of this place, viz., Bombay, of the Hong Kong firm, they, are to remit the same by wire. This subject has already been talked about personally with the representative of the local firm of the Hong-Kong Agents.

"5. On the steamer carrying red (brown) sugar from Mauritius arriving at Hong Kong as to the offers with regard to sales of, those, goods which may be received from that place, Khoja Ra. A. & Co. and Bora Ka. Ji. & Co. of this place are to consult amongst themselves about them: and as to whatever, instructions, they may communicate by wire, through their Agents at this place about causing the sales to be effected, the sales are to be effected according to those, instructions. Accounts of sales should come from Hong Kong, separately, in the names of the two parties, i. e., in respect of half and half, the quantity for each party. On the cargo carried by one, particular, steamer being entirely sold, and, so soon as the account-sales in respect of the entire consignment are received, the amounts of the invoices received, from, Mauritius from both the parties are to be added up, and, the net surplus of the account-sale, is to be ascertained, i. e., on, the one item, being deducted, from the other, as to whatever surplus, or, deficit may be found, the same is to be divided and received, or paid, forthwith by both the parties amongst themselves. In this manner accounts in respect of each of the steamers are to be settled, immediately, after the accounts, sale etc., of the entire, cargo thereof, are received.

"6. As to the steamers which may be chartered at Mauritius for the purpose of the aforementioned business in red (brown) sugar, the same are to be chartered in the name or names of any one or both of the two parties, and as to whatever commission on the freight thereof may be received at Mauritius, or if the freight has to be paid in Hong Kong, then, as to the commission which may be received there, out of that, commission, the sundry expenses and presents etc., made, to Captains being deducted, the net, amount of, commission which, may remain over and, may be received is to be divided and taken in equal half shares, by both the parties.

"7. For the purposes of the aforesaid business in red (brown) sugar the steamers are to be chartered at Mauritius, or at times we people are to charter, steamers, at Bombay and inform, the people, at Mauritius. In those, steamers, red (brown) sugar or other goods, viz., white, ? refined, sugar or molasses belonging to the partnership account of Bora Ka. Ji. & Co., and Ra. A. & Co. are to be shipped; goods belonging to any other person are not to be shipped. In case it be found necessary to give, (issue) orders to some, other people, or if such a time should come when the goods to be shipped on, the joint, account of us both be small in quantity, and, therefore, it be, necessary to give, (?issue) orders, to other people, in the town, then in that case, such orders are not to be given, issued, without, obtaining, the permission of the people at Bombay. They are, first, to apply for permission from Bombay, people,; if, they give permission, the Mauritius, people, are to issue orders; people there, at Mauritius, are not to exercise their, own, authority, for the same.

"8. If on some occassion the said purchases of red (brown) sugar made at Mauritius be small, i. e., if the quantity of the goods be not sufficient to load the whole, steamer for consignment, or if a steamer cannot be secured for shipping such goods as may have been, purchased, then (in that case) the people of that place, i. e., Mauritius, after having taken permission of the people at Bombay or after consulting each other, are to consign those goods for Hong Kong half and half, in each party's name, as stated above by any steamer whatever on the partnership account. The invoices of those, goods, also should come (?should be sent) to us at Bombay as stated above; also the account-sale thereof, should as stated above come to us both, should be sent to us both, from Hong Kong, i.e., in respect of half, the quantity of the goods to each. And as to whatever surplus, or, deficit, (?profit or loss), there may be, found, therein, the same is to be divided and received or paid forthwith half and half.

"9. If at any time there may not be demand at profit in Hong Kong of red (brown) sugar purchased on the partnership account or there being a demand at profit, if any buyer in Mauritius should offer to purchase the same at a profit from our people, there, then in that case also, the people at Mauritius, should take instructions of people at Bombay. If they get permission from Bombay from both of us to effect the sales then, they, both of them are to sell the same on partnership account.

As to whatever profit may be made by such, sales, both the parties in Mauritius are to divide and take the same in equal half shares.

"10. Both of our representatives at Mauritius after consigning sugar, as mentioned above for Hong Kong, will draw hundis payable at Bombay, and, will send here invoices enclosed under cover. In doing so if, they, should draw" documents, hundis, for sums, larger or, smaller than, the amounts of, the invoices, then they are to give or take credit (in the account) for interest thereon,? on the difference at the rate of Re. $\frac{3}{4}$, per cent. per month. (They) themselves are to bear the additional discount paid in respect of the hundis which are drawn in excess. As regards the partnership account, they, are only, to give or receive credit, therein, for the interest at the rate of Re. $\frac{3}{4}$, per cent. per month.

"11. This agreement for the partnership business begins,? comes in force, from the 25th day of July the current year. We bind ourselves on our true religious faith properly to continue the same, in force, for one year."

The appellant contemporaneously endorsed the said agreement as follows:—

"As stated in clause fourth of the above agreement if the Banks at Mauritius should owing to any reason whatever not take the Bombay hundis of,? drawn by, the Mauritius firms of Khoja Rashidbhai Aladina and Co. and Bora Karimji Jiwanji & Co. against the goods shipped and consigned to our Hong Kong firm, then we bind ourselves by this agreement to send 'credit' from this place or to remit by wire half the amount, of the price, of the goods to the aforesaid firms at Mauritius."

Messrs. De Gruyther, K. C., and Henry O'Hagan, for the Appellant, contended that the Indian Contract Act, 1872, governed the appeal as regards the law applicable thereto, and English cases which might be dealing with similar facts had no bearing on the appeal. The agreement of the 25th July 1906 came within the definition of a partnership in section 239 of the Act and it was a partnership for a joint adventure; see Illustration (a) of the section. The debt or obligation was incurred by Rashid on behalf of the partnership in the usual course of business. What he did was necessary and done to carry on the partnership business, and the first respondent was liable therefor. See sections 249 and 251 of the Act. The agreement of the 25th July 1906 was neither annulled nor amended as required by section 252 of the Act, and consequently the rights and obligations of the parties must be determined under that agreement. On the construction of the Act they referred to Bank of England v. Vagliano (1) and Norendra Nath Sircar v. Kamalbasini Dasi (2).

Messrs. Clauson, K. C., and Lowndes, for the first respondent, contended that the agreement in question did not in law constitute a partnership between the first and second respondents in the ordinary sense, but only a joint venture between them, the limitations of the authority of each of them with respect thereto being known to the appellant. On a proper construction of the agreement, which was made with the privity of the appellant, each of the first two respondents was to be responsible only for his own moiety of the joint shipments, and the hundis drawn by the second respondent were drawn in his own name and for his own purpose, and there was no agreement by the first respondent to be responsible for the same. They relied upon Heap v. Dobson (3) and Gibson v. Lupton (4), see Lindley on the Law of Partnership, 8th Edition page 247, where Heap v. Dobson (3) is discussed), and submitted that the appeal should be dismissed.

Mr. DeGruyther, K. C., replied referring to Gouthwaite v. Duckworth (5).

JUDGMENT.

LORD DUNEDIN—This action arises out of transactions connected with a venture in brown sugar entered into by the first and second respondents. The second respondent is now bankrupt and the third respondent is his Official Assignee: and neither of them defended the action or took part in the proceedings under appeal.

The first respondent, Karimji, and second respondent, Rashid, were both merchants carrying on business in Mauritius and had for some time been rivals in the sugar trade.

Rashid had all along also had a Bombay house, and Karim was in the act of setting one up, but it was not at the date to be presently mentioned yet open.

The appellant, Karmali, is a merchant carrying on business in Bombay and Hong Kong.

Karim and Rashid resolved to have a joint speculation in brown sugar to be shipped from Mauritius to Hong Kong. The terms of the arrangement they made between themselves were on 25th July 1906 embodied in a stamped agreement. The document is too long to quote, but may be summarised thus—It begins with a preamble that the parties for "the purpose of doing business in partnership in brown sugar from Mauritius to Hong Kong agree to act as follows." Then follow the terms. Purchases were to be made "jointly" at Mauritius. These purchases were to be made by both firms after consultation with each other, and after taking advice from the Bombay houses. No limit as to purchase is imposed on either firm; but as soon as either firm buys, that firm is to give a delivery order on the Dock warehouse for half the quantity of the parcel to the other firm. When sufficient sugar to load a ship has been purchased, then a ship is, after consultation, to be chartered, and loaded with the purchased sugar and despatched to Hong Kong. Invoices of the sugar, made out separately as half and half, were to be sent respectively to each of the Bombay firms. At the same time Rashid was to draw bills to the value of the sugar on his Bombay house, and Karim on his Bombay house, when it cam to be opened. But until that time came he was to draw bills on Karmali. If the Banks at Mauritius refused to discount the bills on the Rashid or Karim house, the Bombay firms were to be informed by wire, in which case it was said that Karmali would come to the rescue by interposing credit according to arrangement made with him. On the ship arriving at Hong Kong the arrangements as to sale of the sugar were to be carried through by the Bombay houses. Account sales were to come from Hong Kong made up separately half and half to each. Then the invoices were to be added together and the surplus or deficit on the entire transaction was to be divided equally. Chartering was to be done in either one or both names; but all commissions were to be equally divided. In the event of the Hong Kong market being bad and there being an opportunity of a profit by re-selling at Mauritius, this was to be done after permission got from Bombay: and such profit on all sales was to be equally divided. The agreement was to remain good for a year from date of signing. There is then an addendum to the agreement written and signed by the plaintiff, in which he binds himself to come to the assistance of the partners if the Mauritius Banks refuse to discount the bills drawn by the Mauritius firms of the two defendants on their own Bombay firms respectively.

Following on this agreement a venture was commenced, and the terms of the agreement were literally carried out, except in one particular. That is to say, sugar was bought, about 36,000 bags by Karim, and about 4,000 by Rashid. Delivery orders were then given by each to each for half of the sugar purchased by him, and the sugar so divided on shipment was consigned to the Hong Kong firm of the plaintiff. The one particular in which the agreement was not literally complied with was that the bills were not drawn by Rashid and Karim at Mauritius on Rashid and Karim in the first instance and then, on refusal of the Banks to discount, recourse had to the assistance of the plaintiff; but they were at once drawn on and accepted by the plaintiff's firm at Bombay. The bills were drawn by Rashid and Karim respectively for sums approximately representing the value of the sugar shipped upon the separate invoices of each, i.e., about half and half—an exact half being unattainable on account of the packages in which the sugar was put up.

The sugar arrived at Hong Kong, and was sold by the plaintiff to whom it was consigned. The venture, however, turned out a failure instead of a success; the prices realised not being sufficient to give a profit after payment of the price of the sugar, the freight and other expenses.

The plaintiff accordingly raised this action, which is truly an action of accounting against both Rashid and Karim. Now, when the bills drawn by the two defendants had become due, and were payable to the Banks who held them, Karim had retired the bills of which he was the drawer, but Rashid, who had by this time become insolvent, had not retired the bills of which he was the drawer, with the result that the plaintiff whose name was on these bills as acceptor had to retire them. This necessarily brought out a considerable balance on the whole transaction as due to the plaintiff. The bankrupt respondent, Rashid, and his Official Assignee did not oppose judgment being entered against them; but the solvent partner, Karim, opposed judgment upon the ground that he had paid all sums due on bills signed by himself, and that he was not liable in respect of any moneys raised on bills to which he was no party.

The case depended before Russell, J. in the High Court at Bombay, who after trial found in favour of the plaintiff. The material ground of his judgment may be effectively summarised by quoting two of his findings on the issues which he incorporated with his udgment, which were as follows:—

"I find (1) There was a partnership between first and second defendants' firms . . . (4) The plaintiff paid and advanced moneys on the hundis (bills) for and on account and for the credit of the said partnership."

The Court of Appeal reversed that judgment. The gist of their judgment may be taken from the concluding paragraph thereof, which is as follows:—

'Treating the question as purely a question of liability between the parties to the bills of exchange, it is manifest that the plaintiff cannot succeed in charging the first defendant with liability of bills of the second defendant, and having regard to what appears to us to be the correct construction of the agreement between the parties, we cannot hold that there is any collateral agreement by which one shipper agreed to be liable for the default of the other in not taking up the bills of exchange drawn by him on the plaintiff.' "

Their Lordships are of opinion that it is erroneous to treat the question as purely a question of liability on the bills. In other words, they think the issue proposed by the learned trial Judge to himself was right. The case of Adansonia Fiber Co., In re Mile's Claim (6) seems to have been much pressed on the Court by the learned Pleader. But the very first sentence of the judgment of James, L. J., shows that in that case the only question was whether in a winding up proof could be made on the bills alone; and that all questions of ultimate liability were left undecided.

No one doubts that there was here a partnership. It is stated to be a partnership in the agreement, and it amply falls within the definition of a partnership given by the Indian Contract Act, which rules parties in this case. It is, however, a partnership of a limited character, and consequently liability to be enforced against one partner when there is no document of debt, which on its face binds him, can only be justified if it was shown that what he did was within the operations natural to the partnership and for the partnership.

Their Lordships think that the law on these matters is accurately stated in the well-known judgment of Lord Ellenborough in Gouthwaite v. Duckworth (5). In saying "the law," it would perhaps be more accurate to say, a statement of the criterion which is to be applied to the particular facts of each case in order to see whether the transaction is or is not a partnership transaction. In that case it was sought to make Duckworth liable for goods purchased by Brown and Powell, and Lord Ellenborough says this: " There seems also to have been some contrivance in this case to keep out of general view the interest which Duckworth had in the goods: the other two defendants were sent into the market to purchase the goods in which he was to have a moiety; and though they were not authorised, he says, to purchase on the joint account of the three; yet, if all agree to share in goods to be purchased, and in consequence of that agreement one of them go into the market and make the purchase, it is the same for this purpose as if all the names had been announced to the seller, and, therefore, all are liable for the value of them." He distinguishes the case of Saville v. Robertson (7) thus: "The case of Saville v. Robertson (7) does indeed approach very near to this; but the distinction between the cases is, that there each party bought his separate parcel of goods; which were afterwards to be mixed in the common adventure on board the ship, and till that admixture the partnership in the goods did not arise." And Bayley, J., after describing Saville v. Robertson (7) in the same way says: " but here as soon as the goods were purchased, the interest of the three attached in them at the same instant by virtue of the previous agreement."

Mr. George Joseph Bell, in his celebrated Commentaries on the Principles of Mercantile

(7) (1792) 4 Term. Rep. 720; 100 E. R. 1264.

Jurisprudence, after stating that the law of Scotland is the same as the law of England in this matter, quotes the judgment of Lord Ellenborough as correctly laying down the law, citing, inter alia, a case of Kinnear, on the same lines as Gouthwaite, which was affirmed in the House of Lords in 1765, and the whole matter is comprehensively expressed in his Principles, section 385, in words which their Lordships think accurately give the result of the cases both old and modern: "Where goods are purchased or money raised for the joint adventure, and the dealing though ostensibly by an individual is truly and substantially a dealing of the joint adventure, the adventurers are liable as partners. But there is no such responsibilty for goods, etc., purchased on the credit of an individual adventurer previously to the contract though afterwards brought into stock as his contribution . . . . . ."

It may be and often is a difficult matter to say on which side of the line thus indicated the facts of a particular case fall, and cases will be found illustrating both results. To the cases already cited may be added the case of Heap v. Dobson (3), while in the Scottish Courts may be taken as on the lines of Gouthwaite's case (5) the case of British Linen Co. v. Alexander (8) (where the facts are strikingly similar to the present case) and on the lines of Saville (7) and Heaps' cases, (3) White v. McIntyre (9).

Their Lordships are aware that Lord Lindley, in his capacity as an author but not as a Judge, expressed some doubts as to whether the case of Goutwhaite (5) could be supported. They are of opinion that, whether that doubt is sound or not, it is not a criticism on the criterion of law indicated by Lord Ellenborough and the other Judges; but is only an indiciation that a different view might have been taken of the facts of that particular case.

Turning then to the present case, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the trial Judge was correct. The considerations which lead them to that sult are as follows:

It is clear from the terms of the agreement that either of the two partners by the mere fact of purchase (after consultation as to price) could subject any sugar independently of the action of the other to becoming partnership sugar. A purchase of sugar therefore becomes a purchase for the partnership, and any one who sold the sugar, or advanced money by which the sugar was bought, was crediting the partnership with goods or money. This is further accentuated by the provision as to possible re-sale in Mauritius itself. If either party in the case bought sugar, and then came to re-sell it in terms of that article, he could not refuse his co-adventurer a share of the profit he made. These considerations make it impossible to say, as was said effectively in Saville's case (7) or Heap's case (3), that the joint adventure only began when the goods were shipped, as it is clear that the joint adventure began as regards each parcel from the moment that parcel was bought. The learned Judges of the Court of Appeal are impressed with the view that the agreement is "elaborately drawn for the purpose of keeping the interests of the two shippers distinct . . . . except in so far as a combination between them was desirable for the purpose of securing joint shipment and a sale of the sugar at Hong Kong." Their Lordships cannot take this view. It ignores the fact that notwithstanding the separate shipment and consignation documents, the sugar was admittedly to be accounted for as partnership sugar. Supposing that the particular parcels consigned by one had in some way been deteriorated, either by perils of the sea, without insurance, or by the development of some intrinsic fault, it is perfectly clear that the other party would have had to bear his share of the loss resulting in the whole cargo. No doubt the anxious arrangements for shipping and consignation in separate names were peculiar. But the reason for them is amply explained by the fact that the parties desired secrecy, being afraid at Mauritius of the hostile action in breaking prices of a rival whose astuteness they deploringly acknowledged.

Moreover, it is clear not only that the facts as to the terms of a partnership in the sugar shipped are as have been stated, but that the plaintiff knew the whole terms and conditions of the agreement. He knew, therefore, he was helping by advance of credit the partnership in its purchase of sugar. The learned Appeal Judges say that the respondent Karim did not avail himself of the plaintiff's credit. That that credit was not interposed in the precise way originally contemplated by the 4th article of the agreement is true. But that they did not in fact avail themselves of the plaintiff's credit is obviously an error. The bills speak for themselves. When a drawer discounts an acceptance, which acceptance is given at a time when the acceptor owes no money to the drawer, it is idle to say that the drawer does not avail himself of the acceptor's credit; and if anything more was wanted it is to be found in the evidence of Karim himself, who admits in cross-examination: "For the purchase of all that sugar neither I nor Rashid paid a rupee; it was all paid for by hundis accepted by the plaintiff."

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the trial Judge restored: the defendant Karim paying costs in the Courts below and before this Board.

There is a presumption that the possession of one co-owner is the possession of the other, and the burden lies on the co-owner setting up title by adverse possession to prove that he or his predecessor had set up an adverse title to the other co-owner's share, to the knowledge of the latter, more than twelve years before the institution of the suit.

Second appeal from the decision of the Second Additional Judge of Aligarh, dated 11th June 1913.

Mr. S. K. Dar, for the Appellant.

Mr. D. C. Banerji (with him Mr. Lachmi Narain), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit for possession, by partition, of a half share in a small property, described as Ihata Nidhan Singh, in the city of Koil, and consisting apparently of some waste land and the sites of a few houses.

The property belonged formerly to two brothers, Nihal Singh and Bhawani Singh. The rights of the former passed to his three grandsons who in May 1909, alleging that they were owners of the whole property, sold the whole to the appellant. The appellant admits, however, that by his purchase he acquired only a half share in the property. The rights of Bhawani Singh in the other half passed to his son, Mathura Prasad, and later in execution of a decree against Mathura Prasad were sold to two persons who in August 1909 transferred them to the respondents.

The appellant's case is that he was in possession of his half share till March 1911 when the respondents denied his title. The defence was that the appellant or the persons through whom he claims have not been in possession of the share within twelve years of this suit, and that the respondents have been in adverse possession of the same for more than that period.

The Munsif found that as the appellant had failed to prove possession within twelve years the suit failed, although the respondents had failed to prove adverse possession by them for more than a very short time. On appeal the Additional District Judge agreed with the Munsif that the appellant had failed to prove possession within limitation, and, therefore, held that the suit had been rightly dismissed. He went on to hold that as the possession of one of two co-owners could not be regarded as the possession of the other co-owner, the possession of the respondents must be held to have been adverse to the appellant.

AHMAD RAZA KHAN v. RAM LAL.

In second appeal the learned Vakil for the appellant did not dispute the correctness of the rule laid down in Jafar Husain v. Mashuq Ali (1), that where a suit for possession of immoveable property is resisted by a plea of adverse possession for more than twelve years, the question of limitation becomes a question of title, and it lies upon the plaintiff in the first instance to give satisfactory prima facie evidence of possession within twelve years of the suit; but he contended that as the appellant and the respondents are, as their predecessors were, co-owners, or as English lawyers would say tenants-in-common, of the property, the possession of the respondents was in law that of their co-owner, the appellant, and, therefore, the suit must be held to have been brought within time as the respondents have not proved ouster or anything equivalent to ouster of the appellant. Many cases were cited in support of this contention including that of Jogendra Nath v. Baladeb Das (2), which seems to go the whole length of this contention.

The learned Vakil for the respondents referred us to a number of cases. including two decided by single Judges of this Court, namely, Deba v. Rohtagi Mal (3) and Chiranji Mal v. Nathia (4), which are not distinguishable in principle from the case now before us and certainly support the contention advanced on behalf of the respondents.

We are relieved from the necessity of discussing these cases, for it seems to us that the question is covered by the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in a Ceylon case to which our attention was drawn after the conclusion of the arguments, namely, that of Corea v. Appuhamy (5). The plaintiff in the suit had acquired the rights of Balohamy, a daughte of a man named Elias, who died in 1878 leaving as his heirs Balohamy, two other daughters, and a son named Iseris, the principal defendant to the suit. Iseris was in jail when his father died. He came out in December 1878 and took possession of the whole of the property belonging to himself and his sisters. Balohamy sued for possession in 1908 and Iseris pleaded adverse possession for more than the prescribed period. The plaintiff tried to prove an acknowledgment of her title by Iseris but failed. Iseris proved only long continued possession on his part of the whole property. The Ceylon Courts decided in favour of the defendant, but their decisions were reversed by the Privy Council. It appears to us that the ground upon which their Lordships decided in favour of the plaintiff has no reference to the special terms of the Ceylon Ordinance. It was that the possession of Iseris was in law the possession of his co-owners and that nothing short of ouster or something equivalent to ouster could put an end to that possession. Even the fact that Iseris had for years pretended that he was sole heir of his father and had sworn that the plaintiff was not his sister at all, was not considered to justify a presumption of ouster.

The case before the Privy Council was a much stronger case than the one now before us. Here there is nothing to show that the respondents denied the appellant's title till shortly before the suit was brought, and there is nothing to show that the respondents' predecessors-in-title ever laid claim to more than a half share in the property. On the contrary they did not attempt to transfer to the respondents more than a half share. In these circumstances it must be presumed that when the respondents took possession of the whole property they did so for themselves and their co-owner.

The judgment of their Lordships recognizes that there may be cases of an exceptional nature in which ouster may be presumed, but we can discover no grounds whatever for treating this case as falling in that category. On the contrary, as already pointed out, the respondents' vendors seem to have laid claim to no more than a half share in the property though they may have been in possession of the whole.

In our opinion the appellant was entitled to rely upon the presumption that possession was held by the respondents and

Mortgage—Contribution—Mortgage by one partner of whole partnership property—Mortgage disputed by other partner—Compromise—Disputing partner undertaking to pay part of mortgage debt—Mortgage subsequently declared not binding on disputing partner's share—Mortgage-debt realized from partner executing deed—Suit by mortgagor for contribution in terms of compromise—Other partner, liability of.

B, one of the two partners in a firm, granted a mortgage purporting to mortgage the whole of the partnership property. L, the other partner, disputed the right of B to subject the whole of the partnership property to the mortgage and contended that B was in fact only able to burden his own share thereof. Subsequently L brought against B a partition suit in which the Court made a decree giving effect to a compromise which the parties themselves had effected. One of the terms of the compromise was that L should pay the mortgagee a certain amount and that B should free L's portion of the property from the mortgage. The mortgagee thereafter brought a suit on his mortgage, and in that suit it was found eventually by the Privy Council that truly the mortgage only bound B's share and not the whole partnership property. The mortgagee realized the whole of the mortgage-debt from B, who then sued L for the amount payable under the compromise as contribution. L contended that such payment was conditional upon B freeing his share from the mortgage, and as his share was not freed by B but by the Privy Council decision, the suit must fail:

Held, that L was bound by the compromise, which remained unaffected by the Privy Council decision, and that he was liable to contribute.

Appeal from a judgment and decree of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, Central Provinces, dated the 30th April 1908, affirming those of the Court of the District Judge, Chindwara, dated the 12th July 1907.

FACTS.—Bhajanlal and Lakhmichand were the two partners in a firm. On the 5th August 1892 Bhajanlal executed in favour of one Narsingdas a mortgage on the whole of the partnership property. Subsequently Lakhmichand, who disputed the mortgage, brought a suit for the dissolution of the partnership. The suit was compromised and a decree was drawn up giving effect to the compromise, one of the terms of which was as follows:—

"Plaintiff to pay Rs. 8,200 (to Narsingdas) and defendant should obtain redemption from mortgage of any property which by his division has fallen to plaintiff's share and which he (defendant) may have mortgaged with the said Narsingdas."

In 1897 Narsingdas put his mortgage in suit. In that suit it was eventually decided by the Privy Council that the mortgage bound only Bhajanlal's share of the property and not Lakhmichand's share. The mortgagee realized the whole of the mortgage-debt from Bhajanlal's heirs, who brought the present suit against the appellants, who represented Lakhmichand, for the payment of the amount stated in the said compromise decree as contribution. Both Courts in India decreed the suit, and the appellants thereupon appealed to His Majesty in Council.

Messrs. De Gruyther, K. C., and J. M. Parikh, for the Appellants, contended that the payment to be made under the compromise was conditional on Bhajanlal redeeming Lakhmichand's share, and as Bhajanlal never redeemed that share, the appellants were under no obligation to make the said payment.

[Lord Shaw referred to White v. Victoria Lumber and Manufacturing Co., Ltd. (1) and remarked that the case now put was not the case put before the Courts below and that it was not now open to the appellants to put a new case here.]

(1) (1910) A. C. 606 at p. 610; 80 L. J. P. C. 38; 103 L. T. 323.

The case depended on the true construction of the compromise decree, and as the construction of a document was a question of law, the parties were entitled to properly construe it at any stage of the proceedings when there was no question of fact involved in determining the point raised.

Sir H. Erle Richards, K. C., and Mr. Lowndes, for the Respondents, were not called upon.

JUDGMENT.

LORD DUNEDIN.—The claim in the present suit arises out of the following circumstances:—

Two parties were interested in property which they held in partnership, and one of them, called Lakhmichand, brought a partition suit against his partner Bhajanlal, following on a dissolution of the partnership, in which the Court gave effect to a compromise which the two parties themselves had effected. The judgment which was pronounced by the Court in that case is to be found at page 29 of the record. There had been a mortgage granted by Bhajanlal in favour of a person called Narsingdas, and that mortgage purported to convey, as security for the debt which was thereby constituted, the whole of the partnership property.

It was a moot point, however, between the partners as to whether the partner who executed that mortgage had in truth any right to subject the whole of the partnership property to the debt, or whether he was not in fact only able to burden his own share. This being so, one of the terms of the arrangement which was made binding between the parties in the judgment pronounced was that the plaintiff, who is now represented by the present defendants and appellants, should pay to Narsingdas, that is in other words, to the mortgagee, Rs. 8,200, and that the defendant Bhajanlal, who is now represented by the present plaintiffs and respondents, should free the other parties' portion of the property from the mortgage.

It is admitted that the defendants, that is to say, the present appellants, never did pay the Rs. 8,200, except to the small extent of Rs. 200, to Narsingdas. Narsingdas thereafter brought a suit to make good his mortgage, and in the course of that suit it was found eventually by the highest Court, by this Board, that truly the mortgage only bound Bhajanlal's share and not the whole partnership property.

Payment to the mortgagee, Narsingdas, was effected by the sale under that suit of Bhajanlal's property, and the result, of course, was that he had to pay the whole of Narsingdas' debt. Inasmuch as the present appellants had never paid the Rs. 8,200 to Narsingdas, it is quite evident that Bhajanlal had to pay Rs. 8,000 more to Narsingdas than he should have paid. Accordingly the present respondents sue for contribution.

The defence really comes to this, that the payment which is stipulated for in the judgment which was the result of the compromise, is a payment which is conditional upon the other party doing his share. It is said that Bhajanlal never did free the other part of the property from the mortgage because that was freed not by anything done by him, but by the judgment of the Privy Council in the suit which has already been mentioned.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the case is quite correctly put by the learned Judicial Commissioner from whose judgment the present appeal lies. Speaking of the mortgage-debt due to Narsingdas, he says: "It was a disputed point as to whether Bhajanlal should pay all or only half of it, and that dispute was compromised by an agreement which necessarily admitted that it was a partnership debt whereof the defendants (in this suit) on that date were liable to pay Rs. 8,200. From that moment the Rs. 8,200 became a debt due by the defendants to Narsingdas for the purpose of adjustment between the ex-partners of the dissolved partnership."

Their Lordships think that that is the true key to the case, and that it is out of the question now for the present appellants to try to get out of the compromise by saying that if the Privy Council case had been then decided, they would have found themselves free of the liability without entering into the undertaking to pay Rs. 8,200. They are bound by that compromise, however foolish it may have been. They might have paid the money direct to Narsingdas: they did not pay it, and the respondents had in consequence to pay it to him. Accordingly, to make good the terms of the compromise, the appellants must now pay it to the respondents.

Their Lordships will accordingly humbly advise His Majesty to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907), s. 18—Insolvent's property in possession of third person—Receiver—Power of Court to put Receiver in possession of such property.

Section 18 of the Provincial Insolvency Act empowers the Court, where it appoints a Receiver, to remove any person, in whose possession or custody any property of the insolvent is, from the possession or custody thereof, provided the insolvent has a right to remove him.

First appeal from an order of the District Judge of Mainpuri.

Mr. Pearey Lal Banerji (with him Mr. M. L. Agarwala), for the Appellant.

Mr. Girdhari Lal Agarwala, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against an order of the District Judge of Mainpuri, passed in proceedings arising out of the insolvency of one Gur Narain. All the facts have not been properly ascertained, but for the purposes of this order they may be assumed to be as follows:—

In 1905 the insolvent's father, Girwar Dhari, instituted three suits on mortgages. Either before or shortly after bringing these suits he transferred, or purported to transfer, all his rights in the mortgages to one Ratan Lal, who was made plaintiff in the suits. Decrees were obtained and one of them is said to have been satisfied. The other two were on March 23rd, 1910, transferred to Bansidhar, the present appellant, who took out execution, brought the property to sale and purchased some of it himself. Meanwhile Girwar Dhari had died, and on July 2nd, 1909, Gur Narain had been adjudicated an insolvent. On August 13th, 1909, the respondent was appointed Receiver of the insolvent's property. On January 13th, 1910, he put in a petition saying that certain persons who had been called upon to hand over property of the insolvent's had not put in an appearance and praying that he, the Receiver, might be put into possession at once. After considerable delay an order was passed that two of the deeds transferring the decrees to Ratan Lal should be made over to the Receiver at once. Ratan Lal seems to have appeared in Court and said that the transfers in his favour were fictitious and that the transfers by him to Bansidhar were also fictitious. The District Judge then issued notice to Bansidhar and eventually passed the order now under appeal in which, after referring to various proceedings, including an order of the Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri to the effect that the transfers to Ratan Lal were fictitious and an order of the Subordinate Judge of Aligarh holding that the transfers were valid, he has held that the property belongs to the insolvent and that the Receiver is entitled to take possession of it at once. The meaning of the order is not clear. It is not possible to say whether the learned Judge means that the Receiver should take over the decrees, or that he should take over the property purchased by Bansidhar.

Section 36 of the Provincial Insolvency Act certainly has no bearing on the case, for there was no transfer by the insolvent within two years before the adjudication. It follows that Bansidhar has no right of appeal under section 46 (2) of the Act. But along with his petition of appeal he presented a petition praying for leave to appeal under section 46 (3). We think that leave to appeal should be granted in this case, and we accordingly give the appellant leave to appeal nunc pro tunc. The respondent does not object to leave being given if the Court is of opinion that the proceedings in the Court below are not satisfactory, but he maintains that the Court below was competent to inquire and decide whether the property in question belongs to the insolvent, and that if after proper inquiry it is found that it belongs to the insolvent, the Court should remove the appellant from the possession thereof and make it over to the Receiver.

The learned Vakil for the appellant contends that, if the case does not come within section 36 of the Act, the Receiver should be left to bring a separate suit. We cannot accept this contention. It is true that the Indian Provincial Insolvency Act contains no such provision as section 102 of the English Bankruptcy Act, which expressly empowers the Bankruptcy Court to decide "all other questions whatsoever, whether of law or fact, which may arise in any case of bankruptcy coming within the cognizance of the Court, or which the Court may deem it expedient or necessary to decide for the purpose of doing complete justice and making a complete distribution of property in any such case," but it is the duty of a Receiver appointed under the Indian Act, and of the Court itself where no Receiver is appointed, to take possession of the property of the insolvent, and section 18 of the Act empowers the Court, where it appoints a Receiver, to remove any person, in whose possession or custody any property of the insolvent is, from the possession or custody thereof, provided, of course, that the insolvent had a right to remove him.

We have no doubt that the Court had power in the present case to inquire whether the disputed property in possession of the appellant was the property of the insolvent and on finding that it was the property of the insolvent, to take steps to have it handed over to the Receiver. But in proceedings under the Act the Court is required to follow the procedure of a Civil Court in a civil suit. The Receiver and the appellant should have been required to state their respective cases in writing, and having ascertained the points in dispute the Court should have fixed issues and given the parties an opportunity of producing evidence. In simple cases it may be unnecessary to fix issues, but care should always be taken that the parties understand what the questions at issue between them are.

In the present case the proceedings of the Court were of far too summary a nature. Even now it is difficult to say what allegations of fact by either party are admitted or denied by the other, and the parties do not seem to have been given any proper opportunity of producing evidence.

We accordingly set aside the order under appeal and direct that the record be returned to the Court below, that the parties be required to state their respective cases in writing, and that the Court do then proceed to try the questions in issue according to the procedure prescribed for the trial for an original civil case. Costs of this appeal will be costs in the proceedings to be dealt with by the Court below.

Appeal decreed.

KRISHNAMURTI AIYAR AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. VI, rr. 5, 7, 17 and O. VIII, r. 9—Amendment of pleadings—Practice of Subordinate Courts trying preliminary issues and not giving opportunity to amend condemned.

In a suit for partition against defendants Nos. 1 to 4, co-parceners, and seventy-four other persons alleged to have come into possession of various items of the suit property during plaintiff's minority, the plaint contained no specification of the titles under which the seventy-four defendants above referred to were in possession or the defects in them and no prayer for the avoidance of the partition, the decrees and other transactions by which their titles were constituted. The attention of the parties and the Court was drawn to the defects only during the trial of the suit in the course of the examination of witnesses. The plaintiff then applied for leave to amend, arguments were heard on his application and on certain preliminary issues which had been framed, and leave to amend was refused and the preliminary issues were decided against the plaintiff. The plaint was subsequently rejected two days later for want of a cause of action:

Held, that the dismissal of the petition for leave to amend could not be sustained and that the plaint ought not to have been rejected until opportunity had been given to amend.

Per Tyabji, J.—Different procedure and sanctions apply to (1) amending pleadings, (2) furnishing particulars and (3) presenting a pleading subsequent to the written statement; though it may be that on an order to do any of them being disobeyed, the same result—an adverse decision in the suit—may directly or indirectly follow.

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Mayavaram, in Original Suit No. 5 of 1907.

Mr. L. A. Govindaraghava Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Messrs. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, T. R. Krishnaswami Aiyar, T. Natesa Aiyar, T. R. Venkatarama Sastri, T. V. Gopalaswami Mudaliar and G. S. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Respondents.

This appeal coming on for hearing, the Court (Chief Justice and Tyabji, J.) made on 7th March 1913 the following ORDER.—In order to deal with the objection that this appeal is out of time, we think it desirable that there should be an inquiry on oral evidence and a finding thereon as to whether Kuppuswami Aiyar promised to deliver the copies in question and "colluding with some or all of the defendants, finally about the 11th April refused to give the plaintiff the same", as alleged in paragraph 7 of the affidavit of the plaintiff dated July 18th, 1910.

We accordingly ask the Subordinate Judge to return a finding on these questions.

The finding should be submitted in six weeks and seven days will be allowed for filing objections.

In compliance with the above order the Subordinate Judge of Mayavaram submitted the following

FINDING.— * * * * I am inclined to hold that Kuppuswami Aiyar obtained the copies for filing the appeal, that he was interesting himself about the same till at the last moment he joined hands with the 6th defendant, his brother-in-law, and gave up the plaintiff's cause.

9. I find that the plaintiff's case on the issue sent down is substantially true.

This appeal coming or for final hearing after the return of the finding from the lower Court upon the questions referred to it for trial, and the case having stood over for consideration, the Court delivered the following

JUDGMENT.

OLDFIELD, J.—The order under appeal is one rejecting the plaint in a suit, which had been pending for almost three years. It was passed in the following circumstances :—

The suit was for partition against defendants Nos. 1 to 4, co-parceners, and seventy-four other persons, alleged to have come into possession of various items of the suit property during plaintiff's minority. Issues were framed after it had been pending ten months. It was taken up for trial on 16th November 1909, when it had been pending for two years and ten months, and four witnesses were examined wholly or in part. During their examination the objections taken to certain questions drew the attention of the parties and the Court to the fact that the plaint contained no specification of the titles under which the seventy-four defendants above referred to were in possession, or the defects in them and no prayer for the avoidance of the partition, the decrees and other transactions, by which these titles were constituted. Plaintiff then applied for leave to amend; and arguments were heard on his application and on certain preliminary issues, which had been framed. The decision was against him on both; and after dismissal of the petition on the 27th November 1909, the plaint was rejected on 29th November 1909.

In these issues, Nos. 3, 7 and 14, the questions were in effect those raised by the objection just referred to. In the amendment petition the additions to the plaint proposed were, it is contended, such as would meet it, since they included (1) an enumeration in paragraphs 1 to 14 of the connected affidavit of the defects in some (if not all) of the titles in question and of the acts of negligence and fraud by 1st defendant and 5th defendant, plaintiff's guardians, which were pleaded as vitiating them and (2) a prayer for a declaration that the transactions were not binding on him. Though the lower Court has referred specifically to the preliminary issues only in the diary and not in the judgment, it is clear that they and the amendment petition were argued together and that the whole of the questions raised are open for determination in this appeal.

Now it may be conceded that the conclusion of the lower Court, so far as it dealt with these issues and the plaint as presented, was correct and that plaintiff would not have been entitled to proceed, unless and until he had prayed for a declaration or other relief in respect of the transactions on which defendants relied and had made properly specific averments as to fraud and negligence in order to obtain it; and, if it had been the case that after reasonable opportunity given he had persisted in refusing to comply with the Court's requirements in the matter, he would have had only himself to thank for an adverse result. This requires no support from agrument or authority. The course of the proceedings however, as appears from the account already given, was different. Defendants having embodied their objections in the issues above mentioned, which were clearly of a preliminary nature, acquiesced (apparently without complaint) in the examination of witnesses being begun, before they had been disposed of. They were in fact disposed of only in the final order of rejection, which made it impossible for plaintiff to repair the mistake he was held to have committed. The omission to try preliminary issues as such and to allow opportunity for amendment is no doubt frequent in subordinate Courts. But it calls for the strongest reprehension, since the plaintiff falls into a trap by submitting to it, when he is first given to understand that the question of amendment is open pending adjudication on it and he is told eventually that the amendment is indispensable but cannot be asked for at that stage or, as in the present case, has been asked far too late.

This description of the result of the lower Court's decision sufficiently condemns it. The arguments by which it has been supported may be noticed shortly. For those only which relate to the refusal of leave to amend need be referred to, since it has conceded and plaintiff has by his application for leave impliedly admitted that amendment was necessary. Some of them also, those in which the validity of plaintiff's objections to his guardian's conduct is impugned on the facts, may be disregarded, since they will properly be considered at the trial which will have to be held. The first of those which remain, is that the amendment petition was presented after delay and at too late a stage in the case; and it has been supported by reference to Krishnaji v. Wamnaji (1). In that case, however, as in others cited, no principle of general application was laid down; and the decision inevitably turned on the special circumstances, which differed materially from those now in question. For there was no amendment petition by plaintiff in the Court of first instance and it may be doubted whether the conclusion would have been the same if section 153 and Order VI, rule 17, of the present Code had been in force instead of section 53 of the former. It is no doubt said by the learned Judges that the plaintiff, whether he knew of the case open to him and did not state it or did not know of it and sued speculatively, is entitled to no consideration. But with all due respect it may be doubted whether in the latter alternative he might not fairly expect the defendants to disclose the titles they had acquired during his minority before he ascertained or disclosed the grounds on which he would attack them. That was the position of plaintiff in the present case, when he sued. When his opponents during the examination of witnesses insisted on particulars, he asked leave to supply them; he also proposed to add a prayer for further relief, before his objection to do so had been adjudicated on in connection with the preliminary issues. It is not possible to hold that he took this action too late.

It is urged next that the allegations of fraud and negligence in paragraphs 6, 7, 11 and 12 of the plaint were unduly general, and that (1) the affidavit with the amendment petition did not make them appreciably more specific, (2) they could not be made more specific without substituting a new cause of action for that already relied on. The answer as regards (1) is, firstly, that the objections in the affidavit appear reasonably specific as regards the majority of the points raised and, secondly, that, if further particulars as regards any were essential, it would be open either to defendants to obtain them by interrogatories or the Court to grant leave to amend only conditionally on the necessary additional particulars being given. As regards (2) it has not been shown how the addition of particulars to the general statement of the cause of action already made could make that cause of action a new one, or how the addition of an explicit prayer for declaration in respect of defendants' titles could alter the character of the suit, if that were material under the law at present in force.

The last point taken is that the amendment would operate to defendants' prejudice, since the suit, if brought on the date of the amendment petition, would have been out of time. The lower Court has recognised that this would not necessarily make the grant of leave to amend improper, but has held that no special circumstances are available to justify it in the present case. Its discussion of the latter point is vitiated by its mistaken assumption, already referreds to, that the amendment would have introduced a new cause of action and its references to authorities are, therefore, not in point. In the present case the reasons for allowing amendment are at least as strong as they were in Sevugan Chetty v. Krishna Aiyangar (2), limitation being in question there also. The amendment petition, therefore, should not have been dismissed on this ground.

In these circumstances the dismissal of the petition cannot be sustained; and the plaint ought not to have been rejected, until opportunity had been given to amend. The orders dismissing the petition and rejecting the plaint must, therefore, be set aside, the suit restored and the petition again taken up for disposal in the light of the foregoing. Costs to date in the lower Court and here will be costs in the case.

TYABJI, J.—The question in this appeal is, whether the Subordinate Judge was right in rejecting the plaint as disclosing no cause of action and in disallowing the plaintiff's application to amend the plaint.

The plaintiff's suit is ostensibly for partition and was instituted in January 1906. Defendants Nos. 6 to 75 are in the plaint stated to be in possession of the properties which the plaintiff sues to have partitioned, and it is alleged that the said defendants claim to hold the properties by virtue of certain transactions which, it is the plaintiff's case, took place when he was a minor and under circumstances that do not bind him.

I will assume that the defences set up in some of the written statements are such that the plaintiff would have no answer unless fraud or some such matter as is referred to in Order VI, rule 4, is made out by the plaintiff; that the plaint, as it stands, does not to give any such particulars as are required by the rule ; and that the important issues depend upon the existence or non-existence of such matters.

Thirty-one issues were framed on 5th November 1906, 1st October 1907, 4th September 1909, or 27th October 1909. It is not denied that these issues raise " the real questions in controversy between the parties, " nor that if a decision were given on them in favour of the plaintiff, the facts so found would furnish a cause of action.

The final hearing of the suit commenced on the 16th and continued on the 17th and 18th November 1909. "Objection was taken to the plaintiff being allowed to put any questions impugning the partition-deed and Court sales, etc." (these and interim decrees being the transactions above referred to). On this the plaintiff put in an application for permission to amend the plaint, "the object" of which according to the Subordinate Judge was " to supply the said defects," by which is meant the setting out of " the circumstances * * * tending to invalidate" the said transactions. The Subordinate Judge held that the plaintiff had made out no case to amend and unless amended, the plaint disclosed no cause of action. He, therefore, " rejected the plaint with costs."

It seems to me that the Subordinate Judge fell into two errors.

First, he failed to notice that the plaintiff's application, though it was for permission to amend the plaint, did not relate to matters which can be brought on the record only by amending an existing pleading (Order VI, rule 7). What the plaintiff desired to do was partly

(2) 13 Ind. Cas. 268; 36 M. 378; 10 M. L. T. 557; 22 M. L. J. 139.

(a) to furnish particulars of what had already been alleged, although possibly in a vague manner and merely for the purpose of Order VII, rule 5; partly

(b) to put in a "pleading subsequent to the written statement" in reply to allegations contained in the written statements (Order VIII, rule 9); and partly

(c) to make up for what he does not seem to have been responsible, viz., the absence of a record of the examination at the first hearing under Order X, rule 3, referring to the matters in question (I asked learned Pleaders about this and was informed that there was no such record).

Secondly, in holding that the plaint disclosed no cause of action, the learned Subordinate Judge apparently considered not only the allegations in the plaint, but also some of those contained in the written statements. He did not address himself to the question whether if all that is alleged in the plaint were true and there were no other facts before him (except facts of which he could take judicial notice), then the plaintiff would obtain a decree for partition. But he considered the question before him to be :—

(a) Whether the plaint disclosed any answer to certain allegations contained in the written statements—allegations which for the purposes of this appeal may be assumed to have been admitted when made, and

(b) Whether, if any such answer were disclosed, it was given with the particularity which Order VI, rule 4, requires.

These errors are connected with each other. They arise from a misapprehension of the system of pleading contemplated in the Civil Procedure Code and the functions respectively assigned to the parties and the Court in the various steps in procedure (whether by way of pleading or otherwise), which lead up to the point when the issues become part of the record.

The Code contemplates only a plaint and a written statement by way of pleading: Order VIII, rule 9. It may, therefore, happen (when, e. g., a written statement consists of confession and avoidance) that there is no pleading by the plaintiff as to the real points in controversy—nothing by way of pleading to indicate what (if any) is the plaintiff's answer to the facts stated in the defendants' written statement.

But the rules prescribe that at the time of the examination referred to in Order X, its effect shall be recorded by the Court: such a record may take the place of the plaintiff's "reply" to the "defence" in other systems of pleading; and make any "pleading subsequent to written statement" unnecessary (Order VIII, rule 9).

It is true that Order VII, rule 5, requires the plaintiff to anticipate the defence in some degree; and plaints do as a matter of practice frequently give in anticipation the plaintiff's replication to the defence that the plaintiff expects will be contained in the defendant's written statement. But this course, though it may in a great number of cases be convenient and satisfactory, is not the only course open to the plaintiff. In some cases he may be unable to anticipate the defence intelligently or sufficiently: in the others he may prefer to see the defendant state his own case before endeavouring to meet it: and this he is entitled to do.

The defendant is, however, not dependent solely on Order X, rule 3, for being informed of the case that he must be prepared to meet. He can apply for particulars or for a written statement to be put in by the plaintiff, or for permission to interrogate the plaintiff.

Different procedure and sanctions apply to (1) amending pleadings, (2) furnishing particulars and (3) presenting a pleading subsequent to the written statement; though it may be that on an order to do any of them being disobeyed the same result—an adverse decision in the suit—may directly or indirectly follow.

1. Amendment is necessary and is the only course open in cases referred to in Order VI, rule 7, and Order VI, rule 17, viz :—

(a) for raising a new ground of claim; or

(b) for making an allegation of fact inconsistent with the previous pleading of the party pleading the same; or

(c) in case the Court orders amendment (Order VI, rule 17).

In the first two cases, (a) the party seeking to amend applies to the Court and the granting of the application is in the judicial discretion of the Court. In cases however, other than these two, amendment may, as a matter of form, be the most convenient course, though it may not be the only course available: the rules for the exercise of discretion in regard to amendments falling within Order VI, rule 7, may not be applicable on every occasion when there is an application before the Court for permission to amend, still less when the Court has to consider whether it should of its own motion order amendment. The sanction contained in Order VI, rule 18, is operative only when the Court has ordered or permitted amendment.

(2) As regards furnishing particulars of what has already been pleaded but insufficiently or vaguely—this is not a discretionary matter at all. It is ordering one of the parties to give the other his due, for it is the duty of each party to furnish his opponent with " a statement in a concise form of the material facts...but not the evidence " on which he himself relies: Order VI, rule 2. This duty falls in part on the Court under Order X. What this " statement " is to contain is exemplified in the forms (first Schedule, Appendix A, to the Code of Civil Procedure) and prescribed in Order VI, rules 4, 6, 8 to 13, Order VII, rules 1 to 9, Order VIII, rules 2 to 4 and 7, which lay down the decree of particularity required as regards specified classes of allegations : in other words, when the "material facts" consist of any of the classes mentioned in the said rules, there are specific directions as to what "stating them in a concise form" means. How the necessary degree of particularity may be enforced in cases where the rules are not voluntarily followed, is indicated by Order VI, rule 5: further and better particulars may be ordered. If an order to furnish particulars is not obeyed, the sanction (Order VI, rules 16 to 18) seems to be that the vague statements (particulars of which have been ordered and not furnished) may be struck off and thus the plaint may be rendered nugatory; in some cases this may result in the plaint not disclosing any cause of action and becoming liable to rejection: Order VII, rule 11 (a). The counterpart in the case of a written statement contained in Order VIII, rule 5, is relevent only for the purpose of bringing into relief the nature of the sanction which must apply against the plaintiff in similar circumstances.

(3) There is a third class of matters, which it may be the right of one of the parties to have recorded in a pleading or its equivalent, but which does not fall within either of the two classes above referred to, because it has not necessarily to be brought on the record by amending an existing pleading; nor does it consist of particulars of anything already stated. Matter of this kind (unless it is recorded under Order X, or would be redundant owing to interrogatories having been admitted, or is waived by the parties, or considered unnecessary by the Court) might appropriately be the subject of "pleading subsequent to the written statement" with leave of the Court under Order VIII, rule 9. Parties are not apt of their own accord to plead when they are not required to plead. But where the Court orders a written statement or additional written statement, the sanction for disobeying the order is contained in Order VIII, rule 10.

The significance of these rules lies in the control which the Court is given over the matters that have to be stated in the form of pleadings. These rules together with those contained in Orders X and XIV lay down a system of pleading very different from that according to which each party pleads alternately, and on each occasion states only his own case or his answer to the immediately preceding pleading of his opponent, without anticipating the answer that he expects from his opponent, or disclosing how he himself will meet the answer or defence so anticipated—until at last the final pleading consists of a bare joinder of issue (i. e., denial of the facts stated in the penultimate pleading): so that the facts in issue necessarily appear in the pleadings and the issues are in effect framed and recorded in the pleadings themselves.

In India it is the Court that has to frame and record them. The "concise statement of material facts" contained in the pleadings in India may not cover the entire ground of allegations and counter-allegations; and the lacuna may have been caused either by the plaintiff not having anticipated the defendant's case at all, or anticipated it imperfectly, together with the failure of the Court to have followed Order X, rule 3, and the omission of the defendant to apply to the Court for a written statement of the material facts on which the plaintiff relies. If for example, the written statement consists of a confession avoided, then it is obvious that none of the facts stated in the plaint are in issue and the plaintiff's true case as to the real questions in controversy, if pleaded at all, must be pleaded subsequently to the written statement.

It follows that if some matter that ought to be part of the pleadings is found not to be so, it is necessary to examine under which of the above-mentioned classes it falls, in order to discover who is responsible for the omission and what sanction is applicable.

In the present case, assuming that the matters on which the plaintiff intends to rely as a reply to the defences set up fall within Order VI, rule 4, he was not called upon to state his case as to those matters with greater particularity after he had indicated them in the plaint in anticipation of the defences that he expected the written statements to contain and his plaint should, therefore, not have been rejected.

These seem to me the lines on which the questions before the lower Court should have been dealt with; and as I find myself in complete accord with my learned brother's views as regards the arguments on which the order of the Subordinate Judge was sought to be supported before us, I need not deal with them afresh. One question I wish to leave open. I do not think it feasible at the present stage to consider whether the matters on which the plaintiff relies for his answer to the defences set up, are sufficiently particularised in the affidavit dated 19th November 1909. If they are not, then as my learned brother points out the plaintiff may be asked to furnish further particulars; or if he is not able to do so, the consequence may be that at the hearing he may be prevented from giving evidence as to any matters which were not sufficiently particularised to enable the defendants to be ready with their evidence; and if this prevents the plaintiff from establishing those facts which make up his cause of action, his suit will fail. At the present stage to determine with precision what circumstances will afford a valid answer to the defence, would be to try the whole suit hypothetically, instead of doing so after both sides have adduced the evidence on which they rely.

With reference to my learned brother's judgment, I desire in particular to associate myself with his remarks about the desirability of trying preliminary issues at a stage when it is not too late to make amendments consequent on the decision. It seems to me that if my learned brother's remarks were borne in mind, it would save a great deal of futile discussion about matters purely of form which have not even a remote bearing on the "real questions in controversy between the parties," as distinguished from the questions relating to procedure in controversy between the legal advisers of the parties.

I agree, therefore, in the order proposed by my learned brother.

Appeal allowed.

Where in a partition proceeding before a Revenue Court a site of a building occupied by a co-sharer is allotted to the share of the other co-sharer, it is incumbent upon the co-sharer in possession of the building to invite the attention of the Revenue Authorities at the time of the partition to the existence of the building and to ask for an order fixing a ground-rent under the provisions of section 118 of the Land Revenue Act; and if he fails to do so, the other co-owner is entitled to possession in accordance with the partition decree and only an opportunity to remove the materials of the building can be allowed to him.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Jhansi, dated the 15th of November 1913.

Mr. Gokul Prasad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Benode Behari, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal by a plaintiff whose suit has been dismissed by both the Courts below. An unfortunate feature of the litigation is that the plaintiff's case was not properly laid before the lower Appellate Court. There had been a remand by that Court upon certain questions of fact, and findings were returned by the Court of first instance on the issues thus remitted. When the case then came before the learned District Judge for a final decision it was conceded in argument before him that, if the findings of the first Court on the remanded issues were accepted, the plaintiff's suit must fail. This second appeal has now been filed upon a precisely opposite contention, namely, that if the findings arrived at by the Court of first instance, and endorsed by the lower Appellate Court, be accepted, the plaintiff's claim must be decreed. The plaintiff sued for possession of a certain plot of land with certain trees standing thereon by demolition of certain constructions admittedly erected on the land in suit by the defendants. These constructions appear to be an enclosure-wall and a thatched shed. The plaintiff's document of title is a partition decree of July the 1st, 1910, by a Revenue Court. To this partition the plaintiff and the defendants were both parties as co-sharers in the same mahal. The Revenue Court allotted the land in suit, with the trees standing thereon, to the mahal of the plaintiff. It would appear that no question was raised at the time as to the existence of any building on the land in suit, for the partition order specifies it simply as parti or waste land. It necessarily follows that no action was taken under section 118 of the Land Revenue Act (Local Act III of 1901). It has now been found that for many years prior to the partition of 1910 there had been buildings on the land in suit and that the said land had for many years prior to the partition been in the exclusive occupation and possession of the defendants, being used by them as a yard or enclosure for the custody of cattle. It appears that whatever buildings originally existed on this land had sometime or other fallen into disrepair, for the finding is that the existing buildings have been re-erected by the defendants upon old foundations. The case might perhaps have been made clearer if there had been a finding as to whether this re-erection of buildings upon old foundations took place before or after the partition of 1910. In view of the fact that both parties at the time of the partition acquiesced in the description of this land as parti or waste, and that no question was then raised regarding the existence of any buildings thereon, or the applicability of section 118 of the Land Revenue Act to the circumstances then existing, I am not sure that I should not be justified in presuming against the defendants that the re-erection of the building took place subsequently to the partition. I do not, however, consider this point material. The case is, in my opinion, governed by the decision of a Bench of this Court in Letters Patent Appeal No. 43 of 1909 [Nandan Pat Tewari v. Radha Keshun Kalwar (1)] which decision has been reported in Volume 5 of the Indian Cases at page 664. The decision of the Revenue Court in the partition case must be accepted as conclusive of the fact that, up to July 1st, 1910, the plaintiff and the defendants were joint owners of the land in suit. The exclusive possession and occupation of the defendants prior to that date can only be regarded as having been the possession of a co-owner, and, therefore, not adverse as against the plaintiff. If the defendants had intended or desired to set up any claim to exclusive title in respect of this land, they were bound to do so in the course of the partition. The Revenue Court then, as it had jurisdiction to do, took this piece of joint land and assigned it to the mahal of the plaintiff. From that date the plaintiff became the sole owner of this plot of land and is prima facie entitled to possession of the same as against the defendants. According to the view taken by this Court in the case above referred to it was incumbent upon the defendants, assuming that any buildings constructed or occupied by them were in existence on the land in suit at the time of the partition, to have invited the attention of the Revenue Court at the time to the existence of these buildings and to have asked for an order fixing a ground-rent under the provisions of section 118 of the Land Revenue Act. As they failed to do this the plaintiff is now entitled to possession in accordance with the partition decree, and the utmost which the defendants can ask is to be allowed an opportunity to remove the materials of the buildings standing on the land in suit. This view of the law has been contested in argument before me on behalf of the defendants-respondents on the strength of certain reported decisions of this Court. Such cases as that of Ashiq Husain v. Muhammad Jan (2) have no real bearing on the question now before me. They merely lay down the principle that in a partition under the Land Revenue Act the Revenue Court cannot partition buildings or the materials thereof, but is only concerned with the partition of the land. This principle is perfectly correct and is in no way inconsistent with the view of the law taken in the case of Nandan Put Tewari v. Radha Keshun Kalwar (1). There is one case decided by a single Judge of this Court upon which some argument in support of the respondents' case might be based. That is the case of Iswar Prasad v. Jagarnath Singh (3). The facts of that case were somewhat peculiar, inasmuch as the plaintiff was seeking to take advantage of the allotment of a certain plot of land to him on partition in order to secure the demolition of a portion of a valuable building, the greater part of which stood on land of which the plaintiff was not the owner. The learned Judge who decided that case did suggest, though apparently by way of obiter dictum, that it might still be open to the plaintiff in the case before him to obtain an order fixing a ground-rent for the land of which he was the owner under the provisions of section 124 of the former Land Revenue Act of 1873. That same learned Judge was a member of the Bench which decided the case of Nandan Pat Tewari v. Radha Keshan Kalwar (1) already referred to. I think he would have been prepared to distinguish the two cases; whether this be so or not, it is the view of the law laid down by a Bench of two Judges which is binding upon me now. I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal must prevail. I set aside the decree of both the Courts below and in lieu thereof I give the plaintiff a decree for recovery of possession over the land in suit, with the trees standing thereon, subject to the condition that the defendants will be allowed six weeks from the date of this decree within which to remove the materials of any buildings standing on the land in suit which they may see fit to remove. After expiration of this period the plaintiff will be given possession of the land and trees and of any buildings which may have been left standing thereon. The plaintiff is entitled to his costs, but not in my opinion to his costs in the lower Appellate Court, as the present appeal might not have been necessary if the plaintiff's case had been laid before that Court as it has now been in second appeal. I allow the plaintiff his costs in the first Court and this Court.

(1) 5 Ind. Cas. 664.

LUCHMI CHAND JHOWAR v. HEMENDRA PRASAD GHOSH.

Appeal allowed.

Where a promisssory note is silent about interest, section 92, proviso (2), of the Evidence Act (I of 1872) would bar the admission of any evidence to prove that interest was agreed to by a contemporaneous oral agreement.

But where the defendant admits that he agreed to pay interest at a certain rate, effect may be given to such admission without encroaching upon the rule.

Appeal against the decree of Mr. Justice Chitty, reported in 26 Ind. Cas. 736.

FACTS appear fully from the judgment of Mr. Justice Chitty, reported in 26 Ind. Cas. 736.

Mr. D. N. Basu, for the Appellant.

Mr. R. N. Mitter, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

JENKINS, C. J.—In my opinion the judgment of Mr. Justice Chitty* should be affirmed. The only difficulty in the case is occasioned by the second paragraph in the defendant's written statement, for that gives some colour to the suggestion that section 92 of the Evidence Act is not applicable. But for that paragraph I think the plaintiff's claim would be barred by section 92 of the Evidence Act; and, even conceding that the second paragraph of the written statement entitles the plaintiff to say that the whole agreement is not contained in the document, still the Judge has given effect to that admission and allowed the plaintiff interest during the period for which he claims at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. That appears to me to meet the justice of the case, and I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

WOODROFFE, J.—I agree. I think that the evidence offered by the plaintiff was excluded by the provisions of section 92 of the Evidence Act. The plaintiff, however, can take advantage of the admission made by the defendant in the written statement, and he has been given the benefit of that by the decree under appeal. I agree, therefore, in the order passed.

Appeal dismissed.

THE CHURCH MISSIONARY TRUST ASSOCIATION, THROUGH REV. E. F. E. WIGRAM, SECRETARY, AMRITSAR—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Landlord and tenant—Improvement—Ejectment—Structures by tenant—Acquiescence or carelessness of landlord—Compensation.

A tenant is not entitled on ejectment to any compensation for the materials of his structures, unless the conditions of the lease suggest the inference that a permanent lease was contemplated or where the lessees were encouraged to build upon the area leased to them. In this connection, however, acquiescence of the landlord must be distinguished from his mere carelessness.

Second appeal from the decree of the Additional Divisional Judge, Amritsar Division at Jullundur, dated the 25th October 1911, modifying that of the District Judge, Amritsar, dated the 25th March 1911, decreeing the claim.

Mr. Duni Chand, for the Appellants.

Mr. Nanak Chand, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit by the Church Missionary Society of Amritsar for the ejectmant of 24 persons and for the recovery of Rs. 300, being compensation for unauthorized use of the land in dispute and rent of the same.

The first Court decreed the ejectment, also Rs. 240 damages in addition to the usual rent of Rs. 60, which had been paid by the defendants Nos. 1 to 3, who were the original tenants but had associated with themselves, or had sub-let portions of the land in dispute to, the other defendants.

The defendants appealed to the Divisional Judge, urging that plaintiffs were not the owners of the land, that defendants were permanent tenants, that defendants' possession was adverse and proprietary that the plaintiffs had acquiesced in the defendants' erection of structures on the land and were estopped from ousting them, that defendants were in any case entitled to compensation, that there was misjoinder of defendants, that the defendants were not liable to pay an enhanced rate of rent for holding over.

The Divisional Judge affirmed the first Court's decree, with this exception that he reduced the compensation from Rs. 240 to Rs. 120. The defendants have preferred this further appeal in which they reiterate some of the arguments used before the learned Divisional Judge. A preliminary objection is raised by the repondent Society that no further appeal lies, but inasmuch as the decree directly involves a question as to the materials valued at Rs. 4,460 of the structures on the land, we have overruled this objection.

Before this Court only three points have been pressed and all others raised in the grounds of appeal have been dropped.

Those on which we have been addressed are :—

1. The defendants are not liable to ejectment.

2. The plaintiffs are not entitled to any enhancement of rent.

3. The defendants are entitled, if ousted, to compensation for the materials of their structures.

It may be at once noted that the defendants are not deserving of any sympathy, for they attacked even the prorpietary status of the plaintiffs, which is as clear as daylight.

The facts we hold established are that the land in suit was part of an area granted in 1868 by Government to the Society; between that time and 1890-91 the Society granted a tenancy-at-will to defendants Nos. 1 to 3 for use as a stand for hackney carriages and that implied the right to erect sheds and stables of a more or less temporary character. The Settlement papers of 1887 make no mention of the lessees' possession, which is first mentioned in the papers of 1890-1891, so that the lease which was for Rs. 60 per annum in all probability began between 1887 and 1890.

The supervision of the Society, like that of most corporate bodies, was careless, and by degrees the number of buildings increased, though they are still only of the kacha pakka, i.e., burnt bricks set in mud, type.

In 1899 defendants Nos. 1 to 3 already showed signs of contumacy and the Society sued for and obtained rent for three years, 1899-1901, in 1904. In that case the defendants pleaded that they were not lessees of the plaintiff Society, but that the land had been granted to their ancestor by Government. It was held that they were tenants-at-will of the plaintiff Society.

The next contention was that after the decree of 1904, the plaintiff Society covenanted with them that on payment of a monthly rent of Rs. 5, they should be regarded as permanent tenants.

This agreement is absolutely unproved and removes all force from the defendants' contention that they were permanent tenants from the outset.

We hold it unproved that the land was let as a building site, also that a permanent lease was granted to defendants, and it follows that the Society is entitled to compensation or rent at an enhanced rate in respect of the period during which the defendants held over after receipt of plaintiff's notice requiring them to vacate the site. If Rs. 60 per annum was a fair rent in 1887, we do not regard Rs. 120 as an excessive rent for a contumacious tenant twenty years later.

Coming now to the question of compensation to which most of the argument before us has been devoted, we find ourselves in agreement with the Courts below.

We can find not one single point, which argues the acquiescence, as distinguished from mere carelessness, of the plaintiff Society. There is not a tittle of evidence on which it might be argued that the Society had intentionally led the defendants to believe that their possession was of a permanent nature, and to act in that belief.

We agree with the learned Divisional Judge that the case is one of a dishonest tenant who takes every opportunity provided him by the carelessness of his lessor to strengthen his grip on the latter's property.

Many decisions have been cited before us, but they need not be detailed here, for none of them are quite in point. They deal with cases where the conditions of the lease suggested the inference that a permanent lease was contemplated or where the lessees were encouraged to build upon the area leased to them.

The circumstances of this case, as above stated, we find to be quite other.

Connected with this appeal is Second Appeal No. 600 of 1913, in respect of a claim by the plaintiff Society for the rent of this site from April 1907 to April 1910.

On that appeal we have not been addressed at all. Ground No. 1, of course, falls to the ground as a result of the decision in this appeal, and ground No. 2 is beside the point also: the rent was enhanced after notice to quit had been served and the amount allowed by the lower Appellate Court is quite reasonable. That must fail also.

For the above detailed reasons we dismiss this appeal with costs, merely providing that the defendants shall be given time to remove their materials up to the 31st day of March 1915.

Appeal dismissed.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Nagapatam, in Appeal Suit No. 345 of 1912, preferred against that of the District Munsif of Tanjore, in Original Suit No. 589 of 1910.

FACTS.—The plaintiff in this case is a mortgagee. Defendants are the heirs of the mortgagor. The suit is to recover the amount due under the mortgage executed by the 1st defendant's father on 25th September 1880 by sale of the mortgaged properties. 2nd to 5th defendants are in enjoyment of the properties through the 1st defendant. The 3rd defendant pleaded that as the mortgage was executed prior to 1882, there is merely a charge on the property and not a mortgage. The District Munsif found that the mortgage was supported by consideration; but held that as the mortgage-deed contained no specific direction to pay, it created only a charge, and not a mortgage within the meaning of section 31 (2) of the Limitation Act and that the suit was, therefore, barred by limitation.

On appeal, the Subordinate Judge held that it is not an essential element of a mortgage that it should contain a specific direction to pay and that a mere covenant is quite sufficient to create a mortgage in this respect. He held that there was no difference between hypothecations before 1882 and those after that date for the purposes of limitation. He accordingly reversed the decree of the District Munsif and passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs. The present appeal is against that decree.

Mr. P. M. Srinivasa Aiyangar, for Mr. R. Subramania Aiyar, for the Appellants.

Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastri, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It is first argued that the suit document, Exhibit F, merely created a charge. Having regard to its terms, we think that this argument must be rejected with reference to Balasubramania Nadar v. Sivaguru Asari (1) and Rama Brahmam v. Venkatanarasu Puntulu (2).

The second of these cases is authority also against the appellants' remaining contention that Exhibit F, being dated prior to 1882, is not a mortgage within the purview of section 31 of the Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908) and the suit on it is, therefore, out of time. In Sakkarai Ambalagaran v. Sundilapathi (3) also it has been held that for purposes of limitation no special character attaches to documents prior to 1882. In each of these decisions the Court refused to follow Aliba v. Nanu (4) and Rangasami v. Muthukumarappa (5) on which the appellants' argument is based. We respectfully follow the more recent cases and decide against the appellants.

The second appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

The 1st and 2nd respondents' memorandum of cross-objections relates to the lower Appellate Court's failure to award interest from date of suit to date fixed for payment. No tenable explanation has been given for it. Interest of this period and until date of realisation at six per cent. per annum must be included in the decree. The appellants' must pay costs in the memorandum of cross-objections.

Time for payment is extended to three months from this date.

In a suit by the widow of one who was adopted by the defendant's step-mother simultaneously with the adoption of the defendant by the step-mother's co-wife:

Held, (1) that, as simultaneous adoptions are invalid and void, the plaintiff was not a member of the family of the original owner of the estate, nor was she related in any way to the defendant and could not, therefore, plead the limitation allowed by Article 128 of the Limitation Act;

(2) that inasmuch as the plaintiff's claim was based on a contract evidenced by a compromise decree, her case was governed by Article 115;

(3) that since the defendant had kept the plaintiff out of her just dues wrongfully, she was entitled to interest by way of damages;

(4) that Article 131 of the Limitation Act applies only where there has been a denial of the plaintiff's right to receive the maintenance in question as well as a cessation of payment;

(5) that where there has been a decree declaring a right to maintenance, the decree-holder can proceed by way of execution.

Babus Bepin Behary Ghosh (Junior), Nagendra Nath Ghosh and Kehrode Narain Bhuyan, for the Appellant.

Babu Mohini Mohan Chakravarti, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit brought by the plaintiff, a Hindu lady, for arrears of maintenance by virtue of a decree passed on compromis, ewhich is not before us.

The plaintiff is the widow of one Jnanendra Chandra Lahiri, who was adopted by the defendant's step-mother simultaneously with the adoption of the defendant by the step-mother's co-wife. In the well-known case of Akhoy Chunder Bagchi v. Kalapahar Haji (1) the Privy Council held that this Jnanendra Chandra suing as plaintiff in a rent suit could not recover the rents due to the estate of his alleged adoptive father, by reason of the fact that simultaneous adoptions are invalid and void. The plaintiff, therefore, cannot be heard to say that she is a member of the original owner of the family estate or that she is the step-sister-in-law of the defendant or in any way related to him under the Hindu Law. She cannot, therefore, plead the limitation allowed by Article 128 of the Limitation Act. If any authority were needed for this proposition the case of Girijanund Datta Jha v. Sailajanunda Jha (2) is quite sufficient. The point of limitation is really the most importart point in this appeal, inasmuch as it is admitted that maintenance is due from the defendant under the contract evidenced by the decree, and the only question is for how long a period she is entitled to recover arrears.

(1) 12 C. 406; 21 I. A. 198; 9 Ind. Jur. 400; 4 Sar. P. C. J. 678.

In addition to this point of limitation three other grounds were taken in appeal against the learned Subordinate Judge's judgment decreeing the whole of plaintiff's claim. The first objection was that if the plaintiff claims maintenance under the decree, she can only proceed by execution and not by a fresh suit. The next objection was that no interest can be claimed as no interest was provided in the decree. The fourth objection was a question of fact, whether the lady was in the habit of taking large sums of money from the defendant from time to time to meet her father's liability and her own and whether these were set off against her maintenance and she used to execute hand-notes for the balance and, therefore, nothing is due.

Taking the last point first, we find that there is really no evidence beyond the statement of the defendant and his employees that there was any account ever taken. No account is produced, and we do not know how the matter stands previous to the year 1316 when the suit was brought by the defendant on a certain kistbandi bond. Nothing has been put before us in evidence to show what happened in that suit, and it is admitted that no arrears of maintenance have been paid during the last three years and no advances have been made by the defendant to the lady. There is, therefore, nothing to show that payment has been made and that the arrears for three years which she could claim either under the contract or by way of execution are barred or have been liquidated.

As regards the interest, we certainly must find that no interest can be claimed on the contract as evidence in the decree. But we see that what was claimed in the plaint was interest at 1 per cent. per month by way of damages; and if it be that the defendant has kept the plaintiff out of her just dues wrongfully for three years for which she could recover them, we think that it is only fair that she should have this interest by way of damages.

As regards the question whether she can proceed in this suit at all without producing the solenama, we have been referred to the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Ashutosh Banerjee v. Lukhimoni Debya (3) where the facts dealt with were just the converse of the facts in the present case. There the defendant objected to the maintenance-holders executing the decree and maintained that he could only proceed by a separate suit; and what the Full Bench really decided was that he could proceed by way of execution. But the question as to whether circumstances might not arise in which she might legitimately bring a suit was not discussed. But a ruling of the Madras High Court, Sinthayee v. Thanakapdayen (4), was cited by the Full Bench with approval as containing the rule on the subject, and that ruling distinctly lays down that such arrears must be recovered in execution and cannot be made the subject of a fresh suit. But it appears to us that although the details of the contract between the parties are not in evidence before us, the particular contract as regards this payment of maintenance has been set out in the decree, and that it is stated to be one of the terms of the contract between the parties. The objection to this would be that it is secondary evidence of the contract. But on reading the written statement we must hold that there was no objection made to the suit going on upon the basis of the contract as evidenced in the compromise decree, and that this secondary evidence cannot here in appeal be objected to.

A further contention was sought to be raised by the learned Vakil for the respondent that Article 131 of the Limitation Act might apply to this case, and in that connection the case of Gajpat Rai v. Chimman Rai (5) was relied upon. On referring to the judgment in that case, we find that the learned Judges laid down no rule of law at all, but simply stated that they followed the case of Chhagan Lal

(2) 23 C. 645.

(3) 19 C. 139.
(4) 4 M. H. C. R. 183.
(5) 16 A. 189; A. W. N. (1894) 19.

v. Bapubhai (6) and there the rule is laid down as it has also been laid down in this Court, that there must have been a denial of the plaintiff's right to receive the maintenance in question as well as cessation of payment; and that this is so is rendered perfectly clear by the passage at page 663 of the case of Girijanund Datta Jha v. Sailajanund Jha (2) to which we have already referred, where the same point is dealt with in deciding that Articles 128 and 129 should not govern a case of this description, and in that case the contract was a registered one and it was held that Article 116 would apply, or in this case, of course, Article 115. It cannot, therefore, be said that either the Madras Court or this Court has followed the very general and vague rule which is laid down in the head-note of the Allahabad case without any reference to any words contained in the judgment of the Allahabad Judges.

The result is that the suit must be decreed for three years' arrears of maintenance, that is Rs. 1,080, with interest at Rs. 12 per cent. per annum by way of damages for the first year's arrears Rs. 129, for the second year's Rs. 86 and for the third year's Rs. 43, that is to say, in round numbers for the total sum of Rs. 1,338.

The parties will get and pay costs in proportion to their success and failure respectively in this Court.

LATCHMAN PILLAY, AGENT OF VIRAVEN CHETTY—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 63, 73, O. XXI, r. 52—Attachment of money in another district—Procedure.

It is illegal for a Court to attach money lying in the hands of a Court in another district. The proper procedure for a decree-holder in such a case is to have his decree transferred to the Court in that district for execution

Money attached before judgment in a case is liable to rateable distribution in execution of decrees against the same defendant.

Mr. A. C. Mukerji, for the Applicant.

Mr. J. C. Chatterji, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—The facts were as follows:—Applicant instituted a suit against one Po Hlaing on the 19th March 1912 in the Township Court, Pyinmana, and while it was pending, namely, on the 7th May 1912, he applied citing Order XXXIX, rule 1, for the issue of a temporary injunction restraining the defendant from drawing Rs. 500 belonging to him in possession of the Bombay Burma Trading Corporation. The Township Court immediately granted a temporary injunction in the old form prescribed for temporary injunctions under section 492 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, prohibiting the Bombay Burma Corporation's agent from paying Rs. 500 to the defendant. On the 16th July 1912, the Township Court allowed the defendant to draw the money on his giving security. On the 4th March 1913 the Court passed a decree in favour of the applicant, and on the 8th April 1913, applicant applied for execution, that is, he applied that the sureties might be ordered to pay Rs. 500 into Court (with a view to the decree money and costs being disbursed to him). On the 21st July 1913 the sureties deposited the amount of the decree and costs, Rs. 477-15, in the Court. In the meanwhile, namely, on the 21st January 1913, the respondent who had obtained a decree against the same defendant in 1908 in the Sub-Divisional Court, Yamethin, applied to that Court for the attachment of the Rs. 500 just mentioned as being in the Township Court, Pyinmana, and the Sub-Divisional Court, Yamethin, granted an attachment accordingly under Order XXI, rule 52, requesting the Township Court, Pyinmana, to make a rateable distribution. The Township Court accordingly, when the sureties had paid in Rs. 477-15, proceeded to distribute this sum rateably between the two decree-holders.

The applicant now comes here in revision raising various objections of illegality or material irregularity. The principal objection is that the Sub-Divisional Court, Yamethin, acted illegally and without jurisdiction in attaching money in the Township Court, Pyinmana. There seems to be no doubt that the Sub-Divisional Court, Yamethin, was not empowered to make this attachment,

What the Court ought to have done was to tell the respondent that if he wished an attacement in execution made in Pyinmana, he must apply to have his decree transferred to Pyinmana. The result of the Sub-Divisional Court, Yamethin's illegal procedure was that the Township Court, Pyinmana, acted illegally in giving effect to the respondent's attachment.

I do not think that the other objections raised call for particular notice. The Township Court seems to have satisfied itself that the respondent's application was not barred by limitation and Order XXI, rule 52, expressly laid upon the Township Court the duty of distributing the money, if it was to be distributed.

It has been admitted before me on both sides that from the time when the defendant, Po Hlaing, was allowed to draw the Rs. 500 from the Bombay Burma Trading Corporation on security, that money must be taken to have been virtually in deposit in the Township Court. The case, therefore, was one to which Order XXI, rule 52, applied and not section 63.

Again while the applicant, no doubt, ought to have applied for an attachment before judgment and not a temporary injunction, he actually applied for a temporary injunction and the Court granted him a temporary injunction and not an attachment before judgment. The money in Court, therefore, was not actually under attachment by the applicant at the time when it was (illegally) attached by the Sub-Divisional Court, Yamethin, at the instance of the respondent. I think it must be considered to have been assets within the meaning of section 73. The case of Sorabji v. Kala Raghunath (1) to which the learned Advocate for the applicant has referred is distinguishable. In that case the judgment-debtor paid into Court the amount of the decree money for payment to his decree-holder, a step which ipso facto involved the withdrawal of a previous attachment. (Order XXI, rule 55). It was accordingly held that the money having been paid into Court for a particular purpose must be applied to that purpose and could not be regarded as assets available for the distribution. In the present case, the money was the money of the judgment-debtor's which was in deposit in Court, but not under attachment and not expressly for the purpose of paying the applicant's decree since at the date of the respondent's attachment there was no decree yet in existence in favour of the applicant.

The question then is simply, whether I ought to interfere in revision on the ground of the illegal procedure of the Sub-Divisional Court, Yamethin. It was held under the section of the old Code corresponding to Order XXI, rule 52, that an order of distribution made under that section was not final, and that it was open to an aggrieved party to file a regular suit (see the commentaries). Such a procedure would be similar to that expressly provided in section 73.

On consideration, I am of opinion that the lower Courts' proceedings being marked by illegality, it is open to this Court to interfere under section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, although possibly the applicant might have instituted a regular suit. The procedure by way of a regular suit is open to the aggrieved party in a case where the lower Courts have not committed any illegality or material irregularity.

It has been contended on behalf of the respondent that the Sub-Divisional Court, Yamethin's attachment was a mere technical error, but that is not the view which is taken of proceedings without jurisdiction, and the illegality in question consisted of making an attachment without jurisdiction, that is, on property situated outside the local jurisdiction of the Court. The respondent is an agent of a Chetty firm who ought to be perfectly well acquainted with matters of this kind. He must indeed be well aware that if he wishes to execute a decree beyond the local jurisdication of the Court which passed it, his proper course is to apply for the transfer of the decree. I cannot, therefore, regard the respondent as in any way entitled to sympathy.

The order of the Township Court giving respondent a share of the money in question is set aside, and it is directed that the respondent re-pay the amount to the applicant, and also pay the applicant's costs, two gold mohurs.

Order set aside.

HIRONMOYEE DEBI—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (XV of 1877), Sch. II, Art. 11, applicability of—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 30, scope of—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 278, 281—Dismissed for absence, claim under s. 278—Dismissal, whether under s. 281 Suit for possession—Limitation.

Article 11 of the second Schedule of the Limitation Act of 1877 applies only to orders passed after nquiry.

Therefore, where a claim preferred under section 278 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 is "dismissed for absence," a suit for the same property is not barred if not brought within one year of the order, as the order for dismissal is not one under section 281 of the Code but under the sections which enable a Court to dismiss a miscellaneous case for default

Section 30 of the Limitation Act of 1903 is not limited in its operation to cases in which the period of limitation has been expressly altered, but also applies to a case where the period of limitation has been altered as the result of an alteration of the description of the suit.

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Faridpur, dated the 14th July 1911, confirming that of the Munsif, first Court of Madaripur, dated the 31st May 1910.

JUDGMENT.—The first ground taken in appeal is the ground of limitation. It appears that the plaintiff instituted a case under section 278 of the old Code of Civil Procedure on the 24th January 1902 preferring a claim to the property in dispute. On the 8th February 1902 the case under section 278 was "dismissed for absence." The present suit was filed on the 4th June 1909. It is contended that Article 11 of the Limitation Act applies and that the plaintiff's suit is barred, inasmuch as it was not instituted within one year of the date of the order passed under section 281 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are of opinion that the order "dismissed for absence" was an order passed, not under section 281 Civil Procedure Code, but under the sections of the Code which enabled the Court to dismiss a miscellaneous case for default. We are confirmed in this view by the ruling of this Court in the case reported as Sarat Chandra v. Tarini Prasad Pal(1), which settled that Article 11 of the Limitation Act applies only in respect to orders passed after inquiry. It is true that that case related to proceedings under section 335 of the Code. We are unable to distinguish proceedings instituted under section 278 and cases under section 335 of the Code in this connection. The wording of Article 11 has been altered in the new Limitation Act of 1908. The result of the alteration of the wording may be an alteration of the law in this matter. But even if we were to hold that the law has been altered, we are of opinion that section 30 of the new Act is sufficient to save the plaintiff's suit. We are not prepared to limit the operation of section 30 to a case in which the period of limitation has been expressly altered. We are of opinion that the section applies also to a case where the period of limitation has been altered as the result of an alteration of the description of the suit. We are, therefore, of opinion that the suit was not barred by limitation.

It was then contended that the lower Court should have held that the conveyance to the plaintiff was vitiated by fraud, that is, that it was a conveyance for the purpose of defrauding the creditors. The learned Subordinate Judge went into this question in detail and came to the finding that fraud had not been proved, and we are not satisfied that the case of fraud is so strong as to justify our interference with that finding, which is a finding of fact.

The next ground taken in appeal is that the plaintiff having purchased an occupancy holding was not rightly held to have obtained any right by her purchase, in the absence of proof that the holding was transferable. But the Munsif had held that the transfer to the plaintiff had been recognised by the plaintiff's landlord, and this finding has not been upset by the learned Subordinate Judge.

Reliance in the last resort is placed upon a sentence in the judgment of the learned

(1) 34 C. 491; 11 C. W. N. 487.

Subordinate Judge to the effect that what the defendant's father purchased must have been a yiorfa right, which was an under-raiyati right. This is said to be a finding that there was a valid purchase of an under-raiyati right. This is not the meaning we attach to this sentence, which is merely an incidental sentence at the end of the judgment. It was not the defendants' case that they had acquired an under-raiyati right; and if it was the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge, it was a finding which could not be supported in the absence of evidence that under-raiyatis are transferable.

The contentions in appeal fail and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SALICHEEMALA VENKATASWAMI NAIDU—DEFENDANT No. 4—APPELLANT

GUNTURU RANGAPPA NAIDU AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFF AND TRANSFEREE DECREE-HOLDER—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 2 and 16—Execution—Decree, transfer of, recognition of —Judgment-debtor, right of, to appeal—Adjustment, uncertified, admissibility of, in evidence—Fraud not specifically alleged—Transferor admitting transfer—Consideration, want of, for transfer, if can be pleaded by judgment-debtor.

A judgment-debtor is entitled to appeal against an order recognising a transfer of a decree, as the matter would be res judicata in subsequent proceedings.

Order XXI, rule 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, not only excludes proof of an uncertified payment but also of an agreement to release the debtor from all liability to pay his share of the decree-debt in consideration of a sum paid by him, which agreement had not been certified to the Court within the 90 days prescribed by law.

In the absence of any specific allegation of fraud, it is immaterial whether a transfer of a decree is supported by consideration or not, provided both the transferor and the transferee are before the Court and the transferor admits the transfer and declares himself satisfied.

Appeal against the order of the Court of the City Civil Judge of Madras, dated 30th September 1913, in Civil Miscellaneous Petition No. 432 of 1913, in Original Suit No. 2 of 1911.

FACTS.—One Rangappa Naidu obtained a decree against defendants Nos. 2 to 4 and transferred it to one Rajaratnam Naidu. The latter applied under Order XXI, rule 16, for leave to execute the decree by the arrest of the judgment-debtors. On notices being issued, the original decree-holder admitted the transfer. One of the judgment-debtors, the 4th defendant, opposed the application on the grounds that subsequent to the decree on 23rd November 1912, he had paid Rs. 900 to Rangappa Naidu, the original decree-holder, as and for his ⅓rd share of the decree-debt, that the latter agreed to release him from all liability under the decree, that he obtained a recipt therefor, Exhibit A, and that owing to some family quarrels Rangappa Naidu executed the transfer fraudulently and without consideration. He, therefore, prayed that either the transfer may not be recognised at all or that he may be exempted from liability under the decree. This petition was presented on 15th April 1913. The learned City Civil Judge, Mr. C. R. Tiruvenkatachariar, recognised the transfer, holding that he need not go into the question of consideration. His judgment on the point was as follows:—

"3. The only contesting respondent is the 4th defendant. He opposes the application on the ground that, on the 14th of September 1912, he paid to the decree-holder a sum of Rs. 900 in full satisfaction of his liability under the decree and that he obtained from the decree-holder a receipt also to that effect on the same day. He says that the decree-holder owing to some family quarrels transferred the decree subsequently to the petitioner for the purpose of annoying him and that the transfer was collusive and should not be recognised. The decree-holder having admitted the transfer of the decree to the petitioner by the assignment, dated 24th November 1912, the only question which arises so far as the 4th defendant is concerned relates to the alleged payment of Rs. 900 made by him to the decree-holder on the 14th September 1912 in full satisfaction of his liability under the decree and accepted by the latter as such. This payment was not certified to the Court by the decree-holder, nor did the judgment-debtor inform the

SALICHEEMALA VENKATASWAMI NAIDU v. GUNTURU RANGAPPA NAIDU.

Court of such payment and apply for the issue of a not ce to the decree-holder for the payment to be recorded.

"4. The first intimation to the Court of the said payment to the decree-holder is made by the 4th defendant in his affidavit, dated 15th April 1913, which he has filed in connection with the present application for the execution of the decree put in by the transferee of the decree.

"5. The petitioner denies the alleged payment and the genuineness of the receipt filed by the 4th defendant. He further contends that in any case the payment, not being recorded within the time allowed therefor, cannot be recognised, so far as the present application, which is one for executing the decree, is concerned. I am of opinion that this contention must prevail. The defendant relies upon a payment made on the 14th of September 1912. Even if the affidavit of the 4th defendant, filed in connection with the present application, may be treated as an application made by him for the purpose of having the payment recorded, it is nearly four months out of time. It is argued that the rule in question does not apply to transferees from the decree-holder and that in their case it may be shown that they had derived no right by the transfer to the whole or any portion of the decree debt by reason of payment made to the transferor prior to the transfer; in other words, that they have no title to apply to execute the decree in virtue of the transfer. I am of opinion that there is no warrant in the rule for making any such distinction. It does not nullify the payment or adjustment which has not been certified or recorded, but provides merely that it shall not be recognised by the Court executing the decree; when the transferee applies for execution of the decree, the Court which has to deal with that application cannot recognise an uncertified payment which is pleaded by the judgment-debtor, if the period within which the application to be made under that rule for the recording of such payment has elapsed, as it has in the present case. But for the rule, the objection as to want of title or right to execute the decree by reason of the same having been satisfied should equally prevail against the transferor. For how can a person whose decree-debt has been fully discharged lawfully apply to recover the same by levying execution against the debtor who has already discharged his obligation? And hence the position of the transferee of a decree-debt is not in this respect really different from that of the decree-holder himself.

"6. The petitioner's contention that the plea set up by the 4th defendant cannot be entertained in virtue of Order XXI, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code, is in my opinion correct [See Alathoor Badrudeen v. Gulam Mohideen (1)]. I accordingly overrule the 4th defendant's plea founded on the alleged payment."

Against this decision the 4th defendant appealed to the High Court.

Mr. K. V. L. Narasimham, for the Appellant:—The learned Judge erred in holding that Order XXI, rule 2, applied to the case. That order has no application to cases of transferees from the original decree-holder, where it is sought to be shown that the applicant derived no title under his transfer to execute the decree. The learned Judge ought to have allowed the appellant to adduce evidence as to the fraudulent and collusive nature of the transfer.

Messrs. T. R. Venkatrama Sastrair and S. Duraiswami Iyer, for the Respondent, were not called on.

JUDGMENT.—It is agreed on all hands that the recognition by the lower Court of petitioner, 2nd respondent, as transferee of 1st respondent's decree, would be binding on the parties in any future proceedings and that the first mentioned is entitled to appeal against the order containing it. We, therefore, deal with the case on that footing

Appellant's objections to the lower Court's decision are, that it did not permit him to prove the payment to the 1st respondent or the agreement of which (he contends) the discharge of the decree-debt was one term and the payment another. The lower Court was clearly right, under Order XXI, rule 2, in refusing to allow him to prove the payment; and that provision would also exclude evidence of an adjustment such as the agreement, which also is not alleged to have been certified to the Court, if indeed it can be separated from the payment and receipt for it.

Next, appellant complains of the lower Court's omission to allow him to prove that the transfer was without consideration and fraudulent. If it was without consideration, that is immaterial where (1) the transferee and transferor are before the Court and the latter declares himself satisfied; (2) there is no fraud specified in appellant's affidavit and his Counsel cannot specify any, the affidavit giving no particulars except that the transferee is appellant's enemy.

The result is that the appeal must be dismissed with costs, one set for respondents.

Trust property—Breach of trust—Person entitled to become trustee in future, suit by, for possession, whether maintainable.

A person entitled to the office of a trustee only in futuro, has no subsisting interest and cannot sue for possession of trust properties in præsenti.

Where a breach of trust is alleged against the trustees in office, the proper remedy is a suit for their removal from office and appointment of a Receiver pending appointment of new trustees.

Appeal against the decree of the District Court of North Malabar, in Original Suit No. 9 of 1911.

Mr. J. L. Rosario, for the Appellants.

Mr. C. Madhavan Nair, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—We think the District Judge was right in this case in holding that the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue for possession of property alleged to belong to the temple. They are not at present urallars of the temple, though they may some day become so by becoming the senior members of their tarwads. They have, therefore, no subsisting interest entitling them to possession. If the present trustees have improperly alienated properties belonging to the temple to be recovered by the 1st defendant, the remedy is to sue for the removal of the trustees, when in a proper case a Receiver can be appointed to recover possession for the trust pending the appointment of new trustees. It is unnecessary to express any opinion as to whether the present suit was barred as res judicata, as held by the District Judge.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

HARMANOGE SINGH AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFF AND DEFENDANT NO. 1—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 151, 152—Amendment—Decree in accord with judgment but not with intention of Court, whether can be amended—Inherent power—Jurisdiction—Amendment of decree, if allowed, after appeal against that decree pending.

Where a decree is not really in accord with the intention of a Court as gathered from its judgment as a whole, the Court has an inherent power, under sections 151 and 152 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908, to amend or vary a perfected order and to make such other orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice.

Section 152 of the Civil Procedure Code expressly contemplates amendment "at any time" and, therefore, a decree can be amended even after an appeal has been preferred against it.

Babu Ganesh Dutt Singh, for the Petitioners.

Dr. Dwarka Nath Mitter, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.

CARNDUFF, J.—This is an application for the amendment of a decree, which has, it is said, erroneously and inadvertently made the applicants liable for the costs of certain litigation.

The plaintiff sued for the recovery of land occupied by one Ram Gopal Acharia as mohant under a deed of endowment executed by a Hindu lady. Ram Gopal Acharia was made the first and principal defendant; but the deed associated with him a number of other persons in the management of the endowment, and these the plaintiff added as defendants Nos. 2 to 14. In the trial Court the suit was contested by Ram Gopal Acharia alone. The plaintiff obtained a partial decree. He then appealed to this Court, and before us the contest was again solely between him and the first defendant. In our judgment* Mr. Justice Harington, who has since left the Bench, and I ordered that "the appeal should be allowed and the suit decreed with costs." The decree subsequently prepared in the Court's office and, let me say at once, signed by both of us, has given costs against all the defendants, and the present applicants, who were named as defendants Nos. 9, 11 and 12, now submit that as it cannot have been really intended to saddle them with costs, it should be amended so as to relieve them of that liability.

The applicants were nominated in the deed as panches authorised to supervise the management of the endowment. They filed written statements protesting against their inclusion in the category of defendants and disclaiming not only all interest in, and concern with, the endowment, but also all knowledge of their nomination in connection with it. They had never acted as panches nor had they ever been asked to do so. The judgment shows that Mr. Justice Harington and I were to a certain extent influenced by these disclaimers in coming to the conclusion that the endowment was of an illusory character; and, had these defendants entered appearance, they would certainly have been allowed their costs, unless, indeed, it would have been possible to disallow them on the ground that they had been unnecessarily incurred. In these circumstances, it cannot be contended—and Dr. Dwarka Nath Mitter does not contend—that it could have been our intention to make them responsible for the costs: but what the learned Vakil does contend is that the decree in fact agrees with the judgment, as required by Order XX, ruler 6, of the present Code of Civil Procedure, that the former cannot, therefore, be amended as suggested, and that the only remedy, which the applicants had but have lost through limitation, was for a review of the latter.

No doubt, the decree is not inconsistent with the order in the judgment as to costs, and in this way it may at first sight be said to agree therewith. But the order is elliptical, and if the judgment as a whole be referred to, it becomes manifest that the order cannot have been meant to affect the applicants. The result is that the decree is not really in accord with the intention of the Court and that Mr. Justice Harington and I can have passed it only through inadvertence. As pointed out in Brijratan v. Jaynarain (1) and In re Swire (2), there cited, a Court, hasan inherent power to amend or vary a perfected order when it finds that it does not correctly state what it actually decided, and apart from this inherent power to make such orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice, which is expressly recognised by section 151 of the Code, section 152 provides that errors arising in a decree from any accidental slip or omission may be corrected by the Court either suo motu or on application. I hold, therefore, that it is open to us to amend this decree.

There is a further contention that this Court is functus officio, an appeal to the Privy Council having heen lodged: but section 152 expressly contemplates amendment "at any time," and E. v. E. (3) is a precedent for the amendment of a decree under appeal. This contention, therefore, must, I think, also fail.

But the success of the applicants at once raises the further question whether the decree for costs should not now be confined by us, acting ex proprio motu, as regards the added defendants other than the applicants, to the first defendant alone. The consideration of the whole matter was, therefore, adjourned in order to enable Dr. Dwarka Nath Mitter to argue this point, and that he has now done. The learned Vakil admits that all the other defendants except Nos. 2 and 13 are in practically the same position as the applicants. He also admits that the 8th defendant, who was impleaded because he was at the moment managing the Devria Indigo Concern—and the Manager of that concern had been nominated by the deed, ex officio so to speak, as one of the panches—is in a much stronger position both by reason of the representative character he was required to assume, and in view of the fact that he has applied in time for a review of judgment. But Dr. Dwarka Nath Mitter seeks, as I have indicated, to differentiate the cases of defendants Nos. 2 and 13, one of whom was nominated by the deed as a pujari of the endowment and the other as a panch. Both filed written statements protesting against their inclusion as defendants and declaring that they had had nothing to do with the endowment and were not interested in it : but, at the same time, they refused to admit that the deed was invalid, and indeed asserted that it was a valid deed of endowment. To this extent, therefore, they may be said to have resisted the plaintiff in the first instance, but they did nothing more than file written statements and no complaint of any interference, much less of any tortious act, on their part has been made against them in the pleadings or in the evidence. There is no doubt this slight difference between them and the others, but Mr. Justice Harington and I certainly did not discriminate between the absent defendants. When we directed that the suit should be "decreed with costs," we can have contemplated only one of two things, —costs against all the defendants or costs against the solitary defendant who was before us and present to our minds. No third intention can possibly be extracted from the elliptical words we used : but as I have shown, we cannot have meant to saddle the applicants with the costs and a fortiori we cannot have meant to render the present Manager of the Devria Indigo Concern liable. Therefore, we did not intend to saddle all the defendants with costs. And, therefore, we must have meant to saddle only the first defendant with the liability. As Mr. Justice Harington has gone I must here speak for myself : and I have no hesitation in saying that, as a matter of fact, it was the first defendant alone that I had in mind, and that I had no idea of rendering anybody except Ram Gopal Acharia liable for the costs of the litigation. That being so, it seems to me to be our clear duty, now that the matter has come to our notice, to amend the decree by confining the order to the first defendant, Ram Gopal Acharia, and I think that, if we were to shirk that duty, we should be causing needless anxiety, useless trouble and the accumulation of unnecessary costs.

In the result, I would allow this application and going further I would amend the decree in favour, not only of the applicants, but of all the defendants Nos. 2 to 14, making no order as to the costs of the present hearing.

RICHARDSON, J.—I was not a party to the judgment and decree out of which the question before us has arisen and am not in a position, therefore, to speak from personal knowledge as to what was intended or not intended. Upon the materials placed before me, however, it seems to me that the question really comes to this, whether the decree as drawn up correctly represents the judgment according to its true intent.

The language of the judgment in regard to costs is ambiguous, the person or persons against whom costs are given not being specified. The difficulty has been caused by the ambiguity and can only be solved by ascertaining what the judgment means. As to that there can be little doubt. Regard being had to the pleadings and the course which the litigation took and the terms of the judgment as a whole, it seems impossible to suppose that the learned Judges intended to give costs against any of the defendants-respondents except the one who actually came forward to contest the case in the Courts. I am fortified in that view by what has been said by Carnduff, J., who as one of the Judges who heard the appeal can speak with authority on the point.

The result then is that an error has been committed in the Court's offices in drawing up the decree and the error is one which, as it seems to me, it is open to this Court to rectify either under section 152 of the Civil Procedure Code or under its inherent powers. It is not necessary to review the judgment which, regard being had to the provisions of Order XLVII, rule 5, I am not entitled to do. All that we do, as I understand the matter, is to bring the decree into accordance with what the Judges really intended, the judgment being left intact. Under Order XX, rule 6, the decree is to agree with the judgment and it is to state "the amount of costs incurred in the suit, and by whom or out of what property and in what proportions such costs are to be paid." All we are doing is to apply these provisions to the decree before us.

I agree in the order proposed.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE MUNICIPAL COMMISSIONERS OF HOWRAH AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Title—Possession, suit for—Original grant not forthcoming—Registered conveyances extending over fifty years produced, whether sufficient to prove title—Boundary, fixing of—Description in deeds to be followed.

Where in a suit for possession the plaintiffs traced their title to a grant by Government which was not forthcoming, but proved a clear title to the lands for over fifty years by a succession of duly registered conveyances, mortgages, re-conveyances and other title-deeds, and also proved that during that period they had leased portions of the land by registered leases:

Held, that as none of the documents produced by the plaintiffs were impugned, a clear title to the property was proved.

In fixing the boundary of a property the description which is to be found consistently in deeds pertaining to that property must be followed.

Appeal from a judgment and decree of the High Court of Calcutta, dated July 25th, 1910, reversing those of the Second Subordinate Judge of Hooghly, dated August 10th, 1908.

FACTS appear from the following extracts from the judgment of the High Court:—

"In the suit out of which this appeal has arisen the plaintiffs, Messrs. John King and Company, Limited, of Howrah, sought as against (1) the Municipal Commissioners of that town and (2) the Howrah Amta Light Railway Company, Limited, for a declaration of title to, and recovery of possession of, a piece of land in the Gholadanga quarter of the town, lying between their premises on the north and the Telkalghat Road on the south and including part of a certain natural drainage channel or khal. It appears that, on the 26th March 1895, Messrs. Martin and Company of Calcutta obtained, on behalf of the Light Railway, an order (Exhibit K) from the Local Government under the Bengal Tramways Act, 1883, authorising the laying of a tram-line between Howrah and Amta; and that on the 28th August 1902, the Municipal Commissioners of Howrah and the Light Railways Company entered into an agreement (Exhibit L) under which the former were to transfer to the latter for the purposes of the supply of power and the construction of sidings so much of the khal as lay opposite the plaintiff Company's premises. In pursuance of this covenant the Railway Company proceeded to fill up the khal and on the portion filled up to erect offices and lay down lines, with the result, as the plaint alleges, that the plaintiffs were dispossessed of land which was theirs and had been held by them and their predecessors-in-interest for many years. The lower Court found in favour of the plaintiff Company on the question of title as well as on that of limitation, and decreed their suit against both the defendants. The Municipal Commissioners alone have preferred this appeal.

"It is common ground that the land in dispute was originally part of a char measuring some 55 bighas, which was settled by the Government of the day with one Smith in or about the year 1830 and conveyed by the said Smith to another, Calder, in 1844. The original grant is not forthcoming and Calder's conveyance is thus the earliest instrument before us. It may also be said to be admitted that the khal, part of which is, as we have said, included in the land claimed by the plaintiff Company as their private property, has existed from time out of memory and played, as it still plays, a conspicuous part in the drainage system of the Howrah Municipality. It appears to be a natural channel, about half a mile long and at the present time more than 10 feet broad, and its characteristics are described in similar terms by witnesses on both sides. Thus Sambhoo Chandra Bose, P. W. No. 6, who was born in 1833 and has lived all his life in Howrah, states that the water of the Howrah maidan, or public park, is drained into the river Hooghly through it, and that the Municipal drains of this quarter of the town are discharged into it. Similarly, Mr. Donnithorne, who was the Secretary to the Municipality from 1871 to 1884 and subsequently up to the year 1906, when he retired, Secretary to the Port Commissioners and a resident in the town, states in his evidence, which was taken on commission in England, that the khal is an inlet from, or outlet to, the river receiving for discharge thereinto all the drainage of a large part of the Municipal area. There can, therefore, be no question as to the khal's being a public drain, nor can there be any doubt as to the legal position of the case in so far as it is concerned. Qua a public drain, it "vests in and belongs to" and always has "vested in and belonged to" the Municipal Commissioners, see section 10 of the District Municipalities Improvement Act of 1864, under which the Howrah Municipality was first constituted, section 32 of the Bengal Municipal Act of 1876, which repealed and re-placed the earlier enactment, and section 30 of the present Act, which was passed in 1884 and amended in 1894. So long as it continued to be a public drain, any private rights in the sub-soil must remain, so to speak, dormant and in abeyance, and it is not suggested that there is more than a very remote and problematical chance of its ceasing to be connected with the drainage of Howrah. In these circumstances the dispute as to the channel itself is only of academic importance, and the legal aspect of the part of the case need not be further discussed. The real bone of contention is the land situated between the drain on the north and the Telkalghat Road on the south, the khal being brought into the controversy merely because their main issue in the case is as to whether it or the road is the southern boundary of the plaintiff Company's property.

"The plaintiff Company have claimed the land, first, as lessees and finally, as proprietors. As to their lease-hold, it appears that sometime before 1849 Calder, who has already been mentioned, granted a permanent lease of 2 out of his 55 bighas to one Craig, who built upon it what was known as the Vulcan Foundry, and this is the site of the northern part of the plaintiff Company's present premises. Craig's interest in these 2 bighas was subsequently conveyed to one Stewart, and in 1854 forty years' lease was granted by Calder's successor, Golapi Dassi, to a certain Hugh McLardy in respect of 4 more bighas of the 55 immediately adjoining Craig's land on the south. McLardy's interest likewise eventually passed to Stewart, who thus became the lessee of the whole 6 bighas and who, on the 26th March 1881, conveyed his entire interest to Messrs. John King and Company, the predecessors of the present limited liability Company. The lease granted by Golapi Dassi expired in 1894, and in anticipation of this Messrs. John King & Company obtained in 1891 a further lease for 15 years. In all the documents relating to these leases except one, a permanent lease with option of purchase (Exhibit L9) obtained on the 4th April 1855 by one Mackay, the southern boundary is given as a nullah.

"Turning next to the acquisition of the proprietary right claimed, we find that it passed from Smith to Calder, then to Craig, then to Golapi Dassi, then to Mackay and eventually to a certain Chandra Kanta Mookherjee, who mortgaged a parcel of 8 bighas, including the land in suit. In execution of a decree obtained on the basis of that mortgage this land was put up for sale and purchased by Messrs. John King and Company on the 4th August 1893. In Calder's conveyance the land is described as bounded 'on the south by the north of the public road to the north of Mr. Humphrey's house', and in the other documents connected with the claim of transfers indicated above, as well as in the mortgages and other transactions arising therefrom, it is referred to as 'the public road,' or 'a public road,' or 'the Gholadangaghat Road' or 'the Telkalghat Road.'"

"Now none of the documents referred to in this case can be regarded as being in any sense title-deeds. They are obviously insufficient to create title, they are at most mere assertions of title made from time to time by the predecessors-in-interest of the plaintiff Company. In themselves, therefore, even if their intendment were perfectly clear they would be of little value and could be useful only if supported by evidence of conduct pointing in the same direction. The mere repetition, even with variations, in subsequent deeds of a description relied upon in earlier deeds relating to the same property seems to us to carry the case little, if any further; and we have on that account refrained from burdening this judgment with references to all the documents exhibited on either side. It comes indeed to this, that whereas in the lease (Exhibit 2) granted by Golapi Dassi to McLardy in 1854 the southern boundary is given as a nullah, in the conveyance (Exhibit 6) from Smith and Calder in 1844 the property is described as bounded on the south by a road lying somewhere to the north of a particular building then known as Mr. Humphrey's house. That the nullah indicated in the lease is the existing nullah or khal is evident. There can scarcely have been in this locality another channel of the same kind and the plaintiff Company's own witness, Sambhoo Chandra Bose, who is, as has been shown above, in a position to speak with authority, says that the (existing) state of "affairs has been obtaining since" the time of McLardy and "his (own) childhood". On the other hand, although "Mr. Humphrey's house" has been identified by the same witness as the premises now occupied by Messrs. Burn & Co. on the southern side of the Telkalghat Road, the description of the southern boundary in Calder's conveyance is on the face of it vague and indefinite, and there is nothing on the record to show exactly where the public road lay in McLardy's time. The Howrah Municipality was not then in existence; regular roads were but little known in those days, and if, as may well have been the case, the road was a track running alongside the nullah, then the description of the southern boundary in Calder's conveyance was, for all practical purposes, the same as that in McLardy's lease. Considerable stress has been laid on the circumstance that the nullah was excluded from the lease, the argument being that it was but natural that the landlord, when letting a portion of his land for a term, should take care, in the interests of his other tenants on either side, that the lessee should be precluded from interference with the khal passing through the area demised. But that object could have been best attained by the insertion in the lease of a restrictive covenant as to the user of the channel; and the best likely method seems to us to be that which, it is suggested, was adopted. For, if the proprietor had any land south of the khal it must have been a comparatively narrow isolated strip, the separation and exclusion of which, can hardly have benefited any one. Moreover, the argument assumed that the proprietor himself had entire control over the khal, and that is an assumption which we are not prepared to make; for it seems most unlikely that a natural channel of such manifest importance and general utility should have been actually included in the grant from the Government to Smith, unless its continued existence and utility for public purposes had been at the same time secured.

"There remain certain other documents upon which the plaintiff Company perhaps, and the lower Court certainly, has relied more than upon anything else. The Gholadanga property, of which the area now in dispute then admittedly formed a part, appertained in the year 1856 to Mackay's estate, and in 1862 the whole of it, excepting a small area in the south-east corner which was the site of the Vulcan Foundry and corresponds with the site of the plaintiff Company's present premises and the land in suit, was acquired by the Government for the East Indian Railway. Exhibit 19 is the declaration published in this connection on the 29th November 1861, under Act VI of 1857, the enactment then in force for the acquisition of land for public purposes, and in it the area to be acquired is described as 'bounded on the south partly by Telkalghat Road and partly by Messrs. Craig and Company's foundry.' The Deputy Collector's valuation of this land was Rs. 90,000, but Mackay's representatives claimed Rs. 8,28,000; and the matter was eventually referred to arbitration, with the result that the arbitrators awarded Rs. 5,21,650 and expressly declared in their award (Exhibit 24*h*) that the compensation granted was in respect of the whole of the land and premises shown on a map, which seems to have been annexed but is not forthcoming, together with the nullah on the south side thereof."

"First, there is over the khal a masonry culvert or bridge with a parapet and iron railings, giving access to the plaintiff Company's premises from the Telkalghat Road. It is in evidence that this was constructed by McLardy in or about the year 1854, and the fact has not been disputed before us by the learned Vakil for the appellants. It is also alleged, and likewise not denied, that in 1890 or 1891 Messrs. John King & Co. built a staircase resting on the middle of this culvert and leading to the first story of their premises, and there is nothing to indicate that this was done after a reference to the Municipal authorities. As regards the culvert, it seems to us that its construction as far back as in 1854 is no foundation whatever for the assertion of title to the khal thus bridged over; for it was purely for the benefit of,

and absolutely necessary for, the occupation of any premises on the northern side of the khal, while it in no way interfered with the channel or its public utility. The erection of the staircase, although it also was for the convenience of Messrs. John King & Co. alone, is of more importance in view of the circumstance that the Municipality was in existence at the time, and a reference to it might have been expected. But such a reference would probably have been equally necessary under the building regulations in force under the Bengal Municipal Act, 1884, even if the land concerned had been private property; and we have it on the authority of Mr. Donnrithorne that the Municipality was always on the best of terms with the Company, a circumstance which may well account for any irregular action in a matter of this kind having been allowed to pass unchallenged. Moreover, we find it quite impossible to believe that Messrs. John King & Co. were asserting any claim of right by their action at this time, or indeed at any time before 1905. We have already pointed out that, on their present Managing Agent's own showing, they were unaware of the right now asserted by them until it was discovered in the year last mentioned, and their correspondence with the Municipality in 1887, (Exhibit Ill et seq.) when they applied for permission to extend the culvert so as to cover the whole of the khal opposite their premises, proves this conclusively. The attitude they then assumed was on the basis of the extreme limit of their property being the middle of the nullah, and when they were met by the explicit statement of the Secretary for the time being—see Exhibit M2—that 'the Municipal Commissioners believed the whole width of the nullah to be their property' they were content to allow the matter to rest there: see their letters (Exhibit M7 and Exhibit M9) dated, respectively, the 9th and 17th November 1887. And this was the position which they took up again as lately as in 1903 in the correspondence (Exhibit G and Exhibit G1) which they then had with Messrs. Martin & Co. and the Engineer-in-Chief of the Howrah Amta Light Railway. We are, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiff Company's action in connection with the culvert and the staircase cannot be said to furnish any substantial support for their case.

The plaintiffs next rely upon the erection by them in 1888 of darwans' quarters on a portion of the slope of the khal which they had filled up and levelled for the purpose. As to this, it is first to be observed that what was done on this occasion was done on the northern side of the khal, and with that we are hardly concerned. And, secondly, it is in evidence that this 'encroachment," although it was ultimately allowed, was in fact protested against by the Municipality through the issue in the first instance of a notice for its removal. The circumstances connected with this matter are, therefore, inconclusive and of comparatively little assistance to either side.

"Thirdly, reliance is placed upon the alleged picketing of bullocks belonging to the plaintiff Company on the south side of the khal. Here, however, there is a conflict of evidence, and the balance seems to us to be decidedly in favour of the appellants. Mr. Donnithrone's evidence impresses us as being that of a strong and independent witness who know exactly what he was speaking about, and we have it from him that any cattle found on the south of the khal in his time were treated as stray cattle and impounded. He is confirmed in this by the fact that in 1905 an employee of the plaintiff Company was prosecuted under the Bengal Municipal Act, 1884, and convicted by the Deputy Magistrate of Howrah for having picketed bullocks on the banks of the khal. The conviction was, no doubt, set aside by this Court, but the ground of the reversal was that the prosecution had failed to prove, and as a matter of fact had not attempted to prove, that the khal was a public drain and it was held that, on a reasonable construction, section 250 of the Act, although it referred to 'any drain,' was applicable to public drains only. And in this connection we feel bound to remark that there is nothing on the record to justify the, we hope merely unguarded and hasty, observation of the Court below that the Chairman (of the Municipality) as Magistrate got the plaintiff's servant convicted by his subordinate."

"In the fourth place, reference is made to the fact that the plaintiff Company had been in the habit of depositing certain property of their own on the land south of the khal,

It is, however, impossible to lay any stress upon this; for while Mr. Gilmour, who was in the employment of the Company for some years, states that they 'kept some of their materials there,' Mr. Muir puts rather a different complexion on the matter by alluding to the materials deposited as 'scrap materials' and admitting that they were 'materials which they had no use for, and which they threw away.'

"Fifthly, and lastly, it is alleged that the plaintiff Company's steam-launches were moved in the khal. This, however, is perfectly consistent with the theory of the defence that the khal was a public channel. Moreover, it is to be gathered from the evidence of Mr. Muir that the Company's launches were brought up to a distance of not more than 100 feet from the river; whence it follows that they were not harboured in the part of the channel now in dispute, and the point, therefore, becomes immaterial."

Messrs. Lawrence, K. C., and Drunnequer, for the Appellants, contended that the High Court had erred in holding that the documents adduced at the trial were insufficient to create title and could not, in any sense, be regard as title-deeds. They emphasised upon the conduct of the parties and ignored documentary evidence. The property in the sub-soil of the khal was wrongly held to belong to the State. There were a number of documents which clearly showed that the appellants and their predecessors-in-title had dealt with the property in dispute as owners. The property in the land on which a claim lay did not belong to the Government, but to private owners.

Messrs. DeGruyther, K. C., and Dunne, on behalf of the Respondents, contended that the appellants had not established being in possession of the property within 12 years of their suit. The khal and the land were vested in the Municipal Commissioners of Howrah as owners. The respondents on the other hand had been in possession of the khal and land adversely to the appellants for over 12 years prior to the suit. They, therefore, could not claim the same.

Reference was made to Sundram Ayyar v. Muncipal Council of Madura and the Secretary of State (1) and the Bengal Municipal Act, 1884, and of 1899, and the Bengal Tenancy Act, 1885.

JUDGMENT.

LORD MOULTON—This is an appeal in an action brought by John King & Co., Limited, to obtain a declaration of their title to certain lands mainly consisting of a khal, or nullah, along the Telkalghat Road, Howrah, and for ejectment of the defendants therefrom, and for damages or mesne profits.

The course of the case has been rather a singular one. The plaintiffs at the trial proved a clear title to the lands for over fifty years by a succession of duly registered conveyances, mortgages, re-conveyances, and other title-deeds, and also proved that during that period they leased portions of the land by leases that themselves were registered. Their Lordships indeed think that they might go so far as to say that, after the rather complex devolution which took place within that long period had been carefully explained by Counsel for the appellants, it became evident that it was scarcely possible to conceive of a clearer title by deeds than that which was proved by the plaintiffs. They also proved that they had not been dispossessed by the defendants until a period well within the period of limitation, and that, therefore, the Statute of Limitations did not apply.

The Judge at the trial, who went into the evidence with very great care, found in favour of the plaintiffs on all points. An appeal was brought to the High Court. It would seem, from the judgment of that Court, that the Judges pronouncing it took a most extraordinary view of the plaintiffs' case, ignored entirely the clear title to the land which the plaintiffs had proved, and expressly held that they came into Court without title-deeds. They, therefore, treated the case as though it was one in which the Court had nothing relevant before them but the conduct of the parties to decide which of them was entitled to the land.

Their Lordships are entirely unable to understand the grounds on which the High Court rejected the title of the plaintiffs on their title-deeds, nor can they understand what the learned Judges meant by saying that the plaintiffs have no title-deeds. The consequence of this error on the part of the Judges of the High Court is that they never considered the real questions in the case, and their judgment gives to their Lordships no assistance.

The title-deeds of the plaintiffs (none of which are impugned), which are all duly registered, show that the plaintiffs or their predecessors-in-title have been, ever since 1855, the owners of a parcel of land bounded on the south by the Telkalghat Road. Now it may very well be that the Telkalghat Road was not at that date the broad metalled road that it is now, but it is certain that it lay to the south of a khal, or nullah, the bed of which, with its banks, is the principal subject in dispute in the present action.

Their Lordships have been asked to interpret this boundary of the property as meaning that the property of the plaintiffs' predecessors-in-title only went up to the central line of the nullah, which lies to the north of the Telkalghat Road itself. To do that would be to reject the description of the parcels which is to be found consistently in the deeds, and to make these deeds convey land marked out by different metes and bounds from that which there appears. Their Lordships decline so to do. They think that it is possible that by allowing certain portions from time to time to be added to the Telkalghat Road for the purpose of improving that road, the plaintiffs and their predecessors-in-title may have parted with the property, or at all events with the right of possession of those strips of land; but none of those form part of that which is claimed in this action. So far as that which is claimed in this action is concerned, they have title and they have had possession. They have been dispossessed from this, but they brought this action in due time, and their action of ejectment must succeed, and this appeal must be allowed. Their Lordships are quite satisfied both with the reasons and the conclusions of the Judge at the trial, and they will humbly advise His Majesty that the decree of the High Court which is appealed against should be set aside, and that the decree of the Subordinate Judge should be restored and affirmed. The respondents must pay the costs of the appeal to the High Court and to this Board.

CIVIL RULE No. 338 OF 1914.

July 21, 1914.

Present:—Justice Sir Asutosh Mookerjee, KT., and Mr. Justice Beachcroft.

HARI CHARAN CHAUDHURI—PLAINTIFF—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115, O. XIV, r. 2, O. XV, r. 3 (1)—Issues involving mixed questions of law and fact decided without evidence—Decision, whether legal—Trial piecemeal—Practice—Custom, validity of, to be determined when custom established—Revision—Interlocutory orders, when can be reversed.

As the trial of a case piecemeal might lead to protracted litigation and serious inconvenience and involve the parties in heavy costs if the case is taken repeatedly on appeal to a superior tribunal, it is much to be desired that in appealable cases the Courts below should, as far as may be practicable, pronounce their opinion on all the important points and decide on all the issues joined.

A Court acts quite illegally if it treats issues which really raise mixed questions of law and fact as involving only pure questions of law, and decides them as such without taking any evidence.

A Court should not consider the question of validity of a custom till the custom itself has been established with precision.

In exceptional cases, the special facts and circumstances of which so require, the High Court will reverse in revision the interlocutory orders of subordinate Courts.

JUDGMENT.—We are invited in this Rule to set aside an order by which the Subordinate Judge has directed the trial of certain issues in a title suit before evidence has been adduced by the parties. For the appreciation of the objection taken to the order of the Subordinate Judge, a brief outline of the circumstances under which the suit has been instituted is essential. One Mathura Nath Chaudhuri, the predecessor of the first two defendants, died on the 4th November 1863. Three days before his death, he had made a testamentary disposition whereby he authorised his wives, Jogmaya and Sasimukhi, to take sons in adoption. On the 15th June 1866, the senior widow adopted the father of the second defendant, and the junior widow took the first defendant in adoption. It is said—and this is one of the matters in controversy between the parties—that the last surviving widow of the testator died on the 4th December 1900. On the 30th November 1912 one Lalit Mohan Chaudhuri, who claimed to be reversionary heir to the estate of Mathura Nath Chaudhuri, executed a conveyance of a half share in favour of the first plaintiff, Hari Charan Chaudhuri. On the 2nd December 1912 the transferor and transferee jointly instituted the present suit for recovery of possession of the estate of Mathura Nath Chaudhuri, on the assertion that the alleged adoptions by his two widows were void. They joined four persons as defendants, namely, the son adopted by the junior widow, the son of the son adopted by the senior widow, and two transferees of portions of the estate from them. The defendants resisted the claim on various grounds. The questions in controversy between the parties may be gathered from the issues which were settled in the following terms :—

1. Have the plaintiffs or has either of them any cause of action for the suit ?

2. Has defendant No. 1 been properly described in the plaint; if not, can the suit proceed against him ?

3. Has the plaintiff No. 1 acquired any interest in the properties in suit or any one or more of them, by conveyance from plaintiff No. 2 ?

4. Is the alleged transfer by plaintiff No. 2 to plaintiff No. 1 void, as being without consideration and against the rules of Hindu Law and public policy ?

5. Is the suit as framed maintainable, the plaintiffs not having prayed for the declaration of the invalidity of the adoptions of the late Rai Surendra Nath Chowdhury and Rai Yatindra Nath Chowdhury as alleged by plaintiffs in answer to the interrogatories filed by the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 ?

6. Is the suit barred by limitation ?

7. Is the plaintiff No. 2 the nearest sapinda and heir-at-law of the deceased Rai Mathura Nath Chowdhury, as alleged in the plaint, and entitled to his estate on the death of Jogmaya Chowdhurani in case the title of defendants Nos. 1 and 2, by virtue of adoption, fails ?

8. Is the authority to adopt given by the late Rai Mathura Nath Chowdhury by his Will, dated the 16th Kartick 1270 B. S., invalid ?

9. Whether the adoptions of the late Rai Surendra Nath Chowdhury and of the defendant No. 1, Rai Yatindra Nath Chowdhury, were simultaneous, and if simultanious, invalid on that ground. Was Rai Surendra Nath Chowdhury adopted previous to the adoption of defendant No. 1 ?

10. Assuming the said adoptions to have been simultaneous, was there at the time any custom or usage in Bengal validating such adoption ? Assuming the existence of such custom or usage, if any, is the same valid in law ?

11. Is the defendant No. 1 and was the father of defendant No. 2 entitled to possession of the estate of the late Rai Mathura Nath Chowdhury as persons designated to succeed him as heirs or legal representatives, as alleged in paragraph 7 of the written statement of defendant No. 1? Are the allegations made in the said paragraph 7 sufficient to raise the contention ?

12. Are the plaintiffs estopped from questioning the legal status of the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 based on adoption, or their right to possession of the estate left by Rai Mathura Nath Chowdhury and the derivative rights of defendants Nos. 3 and 4, on allegations made in that behalf in the written statement of the defendants and in the statements made in answer to the interrogatories by the plaintiffs?

13. Have the defendants acquired absolute and indefeasible rights to properties in suit by adverse possession irrespective of adoption ?

14. Which of the properties, if any, mentioned in the schedules to the plaint form part of the estate of Rai Mathura Nath Chowdhury ? Are the plaintiffs or either of them entitled to possession thereof ?

15. Are the properties mentioned in schedules B and C of the plaint and schedule (...) of the written statement unconnected with the estate of Rai Mathura Nath Chowdhury and is their claim thereto, or of any of them, barred by limitation ?

16. Were the properties mentioned in schedule B of the plaint the stridhan properties of Shama Sundari Chowdhurani, and were they validly disposed of by her ?

17. Assuming the plaintiffs or either of them to be entitled to possession of any property covered by the suit, on what terms, if any, are they, or either of them, entitled to do so ?

18. Have the defendants or any of them spent any money for the improvement of the properties in suit and if so, what amount ?

19. Are the plaintiffs entitled to any mesne profits ; and if so, for what period and for what amount ?

20. Was the transfer made by defendant No. 1 to the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 for the purpose of paying off debts of the estate of Rai Mathura Nath Chowdhury valid ? Did the defendant No. 1 and the father of defendant No. 2 at the time for such transfer represent the estate of Rai Mathura Nath Chowdhury ? If so, what is the legal effect of such transfer ?

21. Are the defendants Nos. 3 and 4, or either of them, bona fide purchasers for value ? If so, can the plaintiffs avoid the sale to them, at all events except on terms, and in the latter event, on what terms ?

22. To what relief, if any, are the plaintiffs, or either of them, entitled ?

On the application of the plaintiffs, commissions were issued for examination of two of their witnesses, one of them the reversioner claimant himself. After the examination of these witnesses the first plaintiff, the transferee from the reversioner, applied to the Subordinate Judge that issues Nos. 1, 2 and 5—13 might be decided without evidence. The defendants protested against the adoption of this course, as, according to their contention, some at any rate of these issues raised questions of fact or mixed questions of fact and law. The Subordinate Judge overruled the objection, and on the 10th February 1914 directed that the eleven issues specified above except the first part of the tenth issue be tried as issues of law without reception of evidence. On the 16th February, the second plaintiff unconditionally withdrew from the suit and his name was struck off from the category of plaintiffs. Thereafter, on the 28th February, on the application of the first plaintiff, the original second plaintiff was added as a party defendant, but the recitals in the plaint were not suitably amended. On the same day, the defendants applied to the Subordinate Judge to review his order of the 10th February, and prayed that if any issues were to be heard in advance of the others, the third and fourth issues, which raised the question of the validity of the purchase by the champertor-plaintiff from the claimant reversioner, might be so tried under the altered circumstances of the case. On the 9th March 1914, the Subordinate Judge refused to recall or modify in any way his previous order. We are now asked to set aside the orders of the 10th February and 9th March as erroneous and unjust.

It is not disputed that under rule 2 of Order XIV, where issues both of law and of fact arise in the same suit and the Court is of opinion that the case or any part thereof may be disposed of on the issues of law only, it shall try those issues first, and for that purpose may, if it thinks fit, postpone the settlement of the issues of fact until after the issues of law have been determined. This rule has reference to the stage of settlement of issues, and has no direct application to the present case. Nor does Order XV, rule 3 (1), which contains a similar provision for the disposal of the suit at the first hearing, apply to this case. Here the plaintiff made his application long after the settlement of issues and expiry of the date fixed for first hearing. These provisions are analogous to rule 3 of Order XXV and rule 2 of Order XXXIV of the Rules of the Supreme Court, with reference to which it was said by Mathew, J., in Tattersall v. National Steamship Co. Ltd. (1) that it is very desirable that questions of law, the decision of which may make unnecessary the trial of any question of fact, should be raised and decided in advance of issues of fact. In Corporation of Preston v. Fullwood Local Board (2), it was ruled that a question of law, which could not be clearly separated from the other questions in the action or on which evidence might be required, might be tried first at the trial upon such admissions as the parties might make or upon such evidence as might be necessary. To the same effect is the decision in London Chatham and Dover Ry. Co. v. South E. Ry. Co. (3) where Chitty, J., observed that the mere fact that there might be many appeals would not stand in the way of an order for trial of questions of law first, if that would be convenient to the parties and save them expense. On the other hand, the Court of Appeal in Robinson v. Fenner (4) reversed the order of Channel, J. [Robinson v. Fenner (5)], and directed that the action proceed to trial in the ordinary way and that all questions of law and fact be dealt with at the trial. In the Courts of this country, it has frequently been pointed out that the trial of a case piecemeal may lead to protracted litigation and serious inconvenience and involve the parties in heavy costs if the case is taken repeatedly on appeal to a superior tribunal. Mahipal Singh v. Lalji Singh (6).

As Lord Justice Turner said in Tarakant Bannerjee v. Puddomoney Dossee (7), it is much to be desired that in appealable cases the Courts below should, as far as may be practicable, pronounce their opinion on all the important points, because the Courts below, by forbearing from deciding on all the issues joined, not infrequently rendered necessary a remand in a case which might otherwise be finally decided on appeal; this is certainly a serious evil to the parties litigant, as it may involve the expense of a second appeal as well as that of another hearing below. [See also Devarakonda Narasamma v. Devarakonda Kannaya (8); Muhammad Mumtaz Ahmad v. Zubaida Jan (9); Shib Charan Lal v. Raghu Nath (10); Baldeo Singh v. Dharam Kunwar (11); Wasantrao Madhowrao v. Anandrao Ganpatrao (12) and Ismail Khan Mahomed v. Hari Charan Pal (13)]. Tested from the point of view of these principles, the order of the Subordinate Judge is clearly unsustainable. The fundamental defect of his decision is that he has treated issues which really raise mixed questions of fact and law, as involving only pure questions of law. For instance, the sixth issue, which raises the question of limitation, is not an issue of pure law, because the third and fourth defendants, who are strangers to the family, do not admit the time of death of the last surviving widow of Mathura Nath Chowdhury. Again, the seventh issue involves a question of fact, namely, whether the original second plaintiff was the nearest reversioner when the succession opened out on the death of the last surviving widow. The first issue also required modification in the events which had happened; but the gravest objection to the order of the Subordinate Judge arises in connection with the tenth issue, which raises the question of the existence and validity of a custom of simultaneous adoptions. The Subordinate Judge has assumed that the question of the validity of the custom might be determined before the elements which constitute the custom had been ascertained from the evidence. In our opinion, this mode of trial is not calculated to secure the ends of justice. There has been discussion at the Bar as to the validity of such a custom, and reference has been made to the observations in Monemothonath Day v. Onathnath Dey (14); Akhoy Chunder Bagchi v. Kalapahar Haji (15); Venkata Narasimha Appa Row v. Parthasarathy Appa Row (16). It is plain that the Court should not consider the question of validity of the custom till the custom itself has been established with precision. But the order of the Subordinate Judge is open to objection not merely on the ground that he has treated mixed questions of fact and law as pure questions of law, it is open to criticism also on the ground that if any issues are to be tried in advance of others, the third and fourth, which go to the root of the title of the first plaintiff, should obviously have been given precedence. Those issues raised the question whether, on the principle recognised by the Judicial Committee in Chedambara Chetty v. Ranja Krishna Muthu Vira Puchanja Naikar (17) and Basant Singh v. Mahabir Pershad(18) and applied by this Court in Gossain Ramdhan Puri v. Gossain Dalmir Puri (19), the first plaintiff, who is now the sole plaintiff, iscompetent to maintain the suit. Upon a consideration of the entire order of the Subordinate Judge, we are clearly of opinion that, if maintained, it will not secure a proper and speedy trial of this heavy litigation, which involves property worth more than thirty-five lacs of rupees. At the same time, we are of opinion that the issues may be divided broadly into two groups, namely, 1—13 and 14—22. The first group of issues involves questions of the rights of the parties to the estate of Mathura Nath Chowdhury; the second group raises questions as to the extent of that estate, the conditions, if any, subject to which the plaintiff may recover that estate if his title is at all established, and other analogous matters. It is clear that the second group of issues will not require consideration, if the title of the plaintiff is not established.

In these circumstances, as we intimated at the close of the hearing, the Rule must be made absolute and the order of the Court below discharged. We direct the Subordinate Judge to take up issues Nos. 1—13 for trial; the parties will be called upon to adduce all relevent evidence bearing upon the subject-matter of these issues. If these issues are ultimately decided in favour of the plaintiff, the Subordinate Judge will take up for disposal the remaining issues. The costs of this Rule will be costs in the suit. We assess the hearing fee in this Court at five gold mohurs.

We may add that it was faintly suggested on behalf of the opposite party that this Court is not competent to grant relief, even if satisfied that the order of the Subordinate Judge is erroneous and unjust. We are not prepared to take such a restricted view of the jurisdiction of this Court to grant relief, in the exercise either of our revisional powers or the power of superintendence vested in this Court by the Indian High Courts Act, 1861. Instances are by no means rare where, in very exceptional cases, this Court has interfered and set matters right by the reversal of interlocutory orders; Gobind Mohan Doss v. Kunja Behary Doss (20); Amjad Ali v. Ali Hussain (21); Khirode Chunder v. Saroda Prosad (22); Charu Chandra Dutt v. Sarat Chandra Singh (23); British India Steam Navigation Co. v. Secretary of State (24); Umatul Mehdi v. Kulsum (25). No doubt, the facts of each individual case must be the determining factor; in the present case, for the reasons already assigned, we are of opinion that in its special circumstances, the order of the Subordinate Judge should not be allowed to stand.

Rule made absolute.

KOLANDAVELU MUDALI—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Landlord and tenant—Agreement to remit portion of teerva, how far binding—Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 63—Promise to remit part of rent.

A promise to remit a portion of rent, made merely out of grace and not out of any legal obligation, does not affect the right of the obligee to enforce his legal rights as regards payments due to him in future.

Gopalasami Chettiar v. Fischer, 28 M. 328; 15 M. L. J. 14; Radha Raman Chowdhry v. Bhowani Prosad Bhowmick, 6 C. W. N. 60; 12 C. L. J. 139; 8 Ind. Cas. 790; Karampalli Unnikurup v. Thekku Vittil Muthorakutti, 26 M. 195 at p. 196, followed.

Where a promise to remit rent is coupled with conditions, it is not an absolute remission and the landlord is not estopped from enforcing his rights in full.

Where the agreement of parties is distinct and clear as to the rate of rent, subsequent conduct of parties is inadmissible in evidence to show that some other rate was intended by the parties.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Trichinopoly, in Appeal Suit No. 513 of 1912, preferred against that of the District Munsif of Namakkal, in Original Suit No. 262 of 1911.

Mr. T. M. Krishnaswami Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. R. Rangaswami Aiyangar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff is the appellant in this second appeal. He sued (among other reliefs) for a declaration that he was entitled to a sum of Rs. 11-0-4 yearly as the rent reserved under one of the covenants in the sale-deed, Exhibit I, executed by him to the defendant conveying 7/8ths, share in the kudivaram right in the plaint lands. The sum of Rs. 11-0-4 does not expressly appear in Exhibit I as the rent due on the 7/8ths share sold, but the Faisal rent on the whole land is entered as Rs. 12-9-6. The document then recites that 7/8ths share of the lands bearing the said rent of Rs. 12-9-6 is sold, and it concludes by saying that the purchaser should pay the vendor (who retained the melvaram right) "the assessment of the aforesaid land" (that is, the assessment on the 7/8ths share sold.) Having in view the fact that it has been held in Gopalasami Chettiar v. Fischer (1), that the rent payable by a tenant of inam land in the Salem District is prima facie the money assesment fixed at the Faisal survey and settlement, we think that the teerva which the defendant had to pay was 7/8ths of the Rs. 12-9-6 and it was that teerva which (accordinging to the true construction of Exhibit I) was reserved by the plaintiff to himself. Even reading Exhibit II with Exhibit J, it only shows that for the first two years, two different sums (Rs. $3\frac{1}{2}$ and Rs. 4) were respectively fixed as rents by agreement between the parties and that the plaintiff promised not to enforce the Faisal teervai rate till the defendant sank a well and cultivated wet crops. We think that on the construction of Exhibit J, the Court of first instance came to the more correct conclusion.

But it is contended that Exhibit II might be treated as an agreement to dispense with the payment by the defendant of more than four rupees a year as rent and that such an agreement does not require consideration to support it under section 63 of the Contract Act. In the first place, this plea based on section 63 of the Contract Act was never put forward in the lower Courts.

In the second place, Exhibit II does not state that only four rupees will be claimed as yearly rent after the two years' period to which it specifically relates, and it only says that the Faisal rate will be enforced if a well is sunk and wet crops are raised. The fact that the plaintiff has been getting only four rupees a year afterwards, that is, his subsequent conduct, cannot be legally considered for the purpose of construing Exhibit I or Exhibit II.

In the third place, if it is to be treated as an agreement varying the contract under Exhibit I, it is not valid as there was no consideration for it. But if it is treated merely as a promise to remit a portion of the rents under section 63 of the Contract Act, it cannot affect the rents which fell due after the plaintiff revoked his promise to remit a portion of the rent. That a promise to remit made merely out of grace and not out of any legal obligation does not affect the right of the obligee to enforce his legal rights as regards payments due to him in future, has been held in Radha Raman Chowdhry v. Bhowani Prosad Bhowmik (2) in the judgment of Gupta, J., and also by Sir V. Bhashyam Aiyangar, J., in the case of Karampalli Unnikurup v. Thekku Vittil Muthorakutti (3), and we are prepared to follow the said decisions.

In the result, the lower Appellate Courts' decree is set aside and the District Munsif's decree is restored. As the plaintiff has succeeded only on his strict legal rights ignoring his promise made in Exhibit II and as he withdrew his claim for a declaration of his alleged right to levy even Faisal nanjah rates of teerva in certain circumstances (see 8th paragraph of the District Munsif's judg-

Legal Practitioners Act (XVIII of 1879), s. 28—Pleader and client—Oral agreement for payment of fees and expenses, validity of.

An oral agreement between a Pleader and his client for the payment of fees and litigation expenses is invalid and, therefore, unenforceable.

Civil Rule against the decision of the Munsif of Chandpur, dated the 8th July 1913.

Babu Kritanta Kumar Basu, for the Petitioner.

Babu Jatindra Mohan Ghose, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—We are invited in this Rule to set aside a decree of a Small Cause Court Judge, by which he has dismissed a suit brought by a Pleader against his client for recovery of money due on an agreement for payment of fees and litigation expenses. The case for the plaintiff is that he has been for many years past employed by the defendant to conduct his cases, and that the defendant agreed with him verbally to pay him in respect of each case a fixed retaining fee, besides such fees as might be leviable from the opposite party under the rules of Court, together with the actual expenses of litigation and a fee for his clerk. The plaintiff alleges that on accounts taken for the years 1908-1912, he has found that although the defendant has made payments from time to time, a sum of Rs. 83-10-0 is still due from him. He accordingly sues to recover this sum on the basis of the alleged agreement. The defendant contends that he never entered into the alleged agreement with the plaintiff, that if there was such an agreement, it was illegal and unenforceable, and that nothing is due from him as he has always paid the plaintiff in cash for his professional services. The Small Cause Court Judge has not investigated facts, but has dismissed the suit on the ground that the alleged agreement, even if it were established, could not be enforced. We are now invited to hold that the Small Cause Court Judge has taken an erroneous view of the scope of section 28 of the Legal Practitioners Act.

Section 28—we quote only so much of the section as is applicable to the present case—is in these terms: "No agreement entered into by any Pleader . . . with any person retaining or employing him, respecting the amount and manner of payment for the whole or any part of any past or future services, fees, charges or disbursements in respect of business done or to be done by such Pleader... shall be valid, unless it is made in writing signed by such person, and is, within fifteen days from the date on which it is executed, filed in the District Court or in some Court in which some portion of the business in respect of which it has been executed has been or is to be done." This section, it is plain, completely covers the case before us. The plaintiff, a Pleader, sues to enforce an alleged oral agreement with his client for payment of his fees and incidental expenses for the conduct of his cases. The agreement is not vaild under section 28 of the Legal Practitioners Act and cannot consequently be enforced. An earnest endeavour, however, has been made to escape from the provisions of section 28 by reference to the terms of section 27, and reliance has been placed upon the cases of Sarat Chandra Roy Chowdry v. Chandi Charan Mitra (1); Sarat Chunder Roy Chawdhry v. Chundra Kanta Roy (2); Razi-ud-din v. Karim Bakhsh (3); Raghunath Saran Singh v. Sri Ram (4); Rama v. Kunji(5); Krishnasami v. Kesava(6) and Subba Pillai v. Ramasami Aiyar (7). Reference has also been made to sections 4, 6 and 9 of the English Attorney and Solicitors Act, 33 and 34 Victoria, Chapter 28, which, it is said, indicate the policy which underlies sections 28, 29 and 30 of the Legal Practitioners Act. The cases mentioned were reviewed by this Court in Kamini Debi v. Khettra Mohan Ganguli (8) and Kamini Moni Debi v. Khetra Mohan Ganguli (9), where it was pointed out that the language of section 28 is comprehensive enough to include every oral agreement between a Pleader and his client for the payment of fees for professional services and incidental expenses, and cannot be restricted by reference to section 27, which does not apply to such an agreement. We see no reason to doubt the correctness of the view taken in the two cases last mentioned, which has been accepted in Mohendra Lal v. Akhil Chandra (10). We are not disposed to accept the invitation of the petitioner to place a narrow construction upon section 28 and thus to fritter away the effect of a salutary provision of the law. The tendency of modern decisions clearly points in the opposite direction, for instance it was ruled in Kattick Ramunni v. Udayamangalath (11) that section 28 forbids all verbal agreements for the payment of fees between Pleaders and clients, and in Game v. Kye (12) it was held that the section applies to agreements for fees in respect of professional services by a Pleader, even where the business does not lie in any Court, civil or criminal. We hold accordingly that the oral agreement on which this suit is founded, is not valid and cannot be made the foundation for a decree against the defendant. In view of the frame of the suit, we need not consider whether the plaintiff could have succeeded on a claim for value of services rendered quantum meruit, or on a claim under section 70 of the Indian Contract Act for recovery of sums actually spent for the benefit of the defendant.

The Rule is discharged with costs, three gold mohurs.

The plaintiffs petitioned Government to allow them to use 45 cents of their own land free of assessment for the purposes of a cattle-shed and a farm-house in connection with their adjoining lands. This request was granted and in the next patta 45 cents of land was included, although the assessment was deducted from the total amount payable:

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Guntur, in Appeal Suit No. 57 of 1911, preferred against that of the District Munsif of Tenali, in Original Suit No. 402 of 1909.

The Government Pleader, for the Government.

Mr. V. Ramadoss, for the Respondents.

JUGDMENT.—It is admitted that the suit land was the property of plaintiffs' family in 1857, and the lower Appellate Court has found that they did not then give up their interest in it and place it at the absolute disposal of Government. The Government Pleader argues that the lower Appellate Court has wrongly interpreted the facts and relies on Kattai Mahammad Meera Mohideen v. Secretary of State for India (1). The facts in that case are very different from those in the present case. In that case the ryots at the time of Settlement petitioned the Collector to remit the assessment on certain of their lands, in order that the land should be used for village house site. This was accordingly done and the lands were classified with the knowledge of the ryots in the Settlement Registers as village site poramboke, and it was held that the ryot's private rights in the lands were extinguished.

In the present case it appears that plaintiffs' family were much inconvenienced in their agricultural work by the fact that a canal had been newly excavated between their lands and the village. They accordingly petitioned Government to allow them to use 45 cents of their own land free of assessment for the purposes of a cattle-shed and a farm-house in connection with their other adjoining lands. This request was granted and in the next patta, Exhibit A, the 45 cents of land was included although the assessment, as it was, was deducted fromthe total amount payable.

There is, therefore, no analogy between the two cases: and the finding of the Subordinate Judge cannot be regarded as illegal.

Appeal dismissed.

Certain premises were rented by an unregistered lease. A yearly rental was fixed, but the period during which the tenancy was to continue was not settled. The tenant, however, continued in possession for several years and the landlord accepted rent from him:

Held, that the tenancy was for one year only and the legal effect of its being held over was that it was renewed from month to month and was, therefore, terminable by the lessor by 15 days' notice,

The presumption of a yearly taking does not always arise from the rent being payable yearly.

"An agreement to the contrary" within the meaning of section 116, Transfer of Property Act, means an agreement as to the terms of the holding over.

A tenancy for one year coupled with an express or implied agreement to renew it from year to year cannot be created except by a registered agreement.

In calculating the fifteen days' notice mentioned in section 106, Transfer of Property Act, the day on which the notice is served is excluded, but the day on which it expires is taken into account. The notice must expire with the end of a month of tenancy.

A notice under section 106, Transfer of Property Act, is valid if signed by the am-mukhtear of the landlord.

A post mark is presumed to be genuine and when taken as genuine, it is evidence that the cover bearing it was stamped on the date the impression bears and that the place or office mentioned therein was actually the place where it was affixed.

The date of a letter is not necessarily the date of its posting.

An article sent by post is presumed to be delivered to the addressee in due course of post, but to fix the date of its tender to the addressee the usual course of mail between the place of posting and the place of receipt must be ascertained from evidence, inasmuch as a Court cannot take as matters of public notoriety the running time of trains between two places on a particular day, the number of mail trains within a given time and other facts involved in such an inquiry.

The date of delivery of an article sent by mail cannot necessarily be inferred from the post mark of the receiving office, more so in the case of registered articles which are delivered by the post office only on specified days and between specified working hours.

An endorsement on the cover of a letter by a postal peon that the cover was tendered to the addressee on a certain date and was refused, is at best a record of a statement by the peon and the events recited therein must be proved by calling him as a witness, unless, the statement becomes admissible under section 32 (2), or section 33 of the Evidence Act applies.

Such an endorsement is not admissible even as a statement made by a Public Officer in the discharge of his duty.

Proof of the fact that a letter correctly addressed has been posted and has not been received back through the Dead Letter Office may justify the presumption that it had been delivered in due course of mail to the addressee, but proof of the fact that a letter has been duly posted and has been returned by the Postal Authorities does not justify the presumption that it has been so returned because it has been refused by the addressee; for it may well be that it has been returned because the addressee has not been found; much less is there a presumption that the cover has been tendered to the addressee on a particular date.

The presumption mentioned in section 114 of the Evidence Act is not a presumption of law but a presumption of fact.

GOBINDA CHANDRA SAHA v. DWARKA NATH PATITA.

Therefore, where the addressee pledges his oath that a certain cover was never tendered to him, the presumption of regularity of official business cannot be treated as conclusive against him.

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Dacca, dated the 1st March, 1913.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal on behalf of the plaintiffs in a suit for ejectment of the defendant, on the allegation that he held as a tenant of the disputed premises from month to month and had failed to vacate the land inspite of service of notice to quit. The defendant resisted the claim on the ground that his tenancy had not been validly terminated. The Subordinate Judge has given effect to this contention and has dismissed the suit. On the present appeal, three points have emerged for consideration, namely, first, was the defendant, as alleged by the plaintiffs, a tenant from month to month, entitled only to fifteen days' notice to quit; secondly, was the notice in proper form; and, thirdly, was the notice served in accordance with law?

As regards the first question, the case for the defendant is that he took the premises from the commencement of the Bengali year 1306, that the rent was fixed at Rs. 275 a year, and that the period during which the tenancy was to continue was not settled. It is plain that the defendant became a tenant for one year only for a rent of Rs. 275 because, under section 107 of the Transfer of Property Act, which was in force when the tenancy was constituted, a lease of immoveable property from year to year or for any term exceeding one year or reserving a yearly rent could be made only by a registered instrument. The position, consequently, was that the tenancy would, in ordinary course, expire at the end of the year 1306. The tenant, however, continued in occupation, and the landlords accepted rent from him for 1307; in other words, the tenant held over, the legal effect whereof is deducible from section 116 of the Transfer of Property Act. That section—we quote only so much of it as is applicable to the present case—is in these terms: "If a lessee.....of property remains in possession thereof after the determination of the lease granted to the lessee, and the lessor or his legal representative accepts rent from the lessee.....or otherwise assents to his continuing in possession, the lease is, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, renewed from year to year, or from month to month, according to the purpose for which the property is leased, as specified in section 106." In the case before us, the lease was neither for agricultural nor for manufacturing purposes within the meaning of section 106, as the defendant had taken the property for a stationery shop. The lease was consequently renewed, prima facie, from month to month. The question next arises, whether there was "an agreement to the contrary" within the meaning of section 116. As was pointed out by Maclean, C. J., in Troilokya Nath Roy v. Sarat Chandra Banerjee (1), the agreement mentioned means an agreement as to the terms of the holding over. Now, there is no proof of an express agreement as to the terms on which the tenant was to hold over. But it is argued that as the rent was originally agreed to be an annual rent, there was an implied agreement that if the tenant held over, he should hold over from year to year. This argument is obviously fallacious. Let us assume that the mode in which the rent is expressed to be reserved, for example, at so much a year, affords a presumption that the tenancy is of a character corresponding to it: Wilkinson v. Hall (2); though it is plain that the rule is not of universal application and the presumption of a yearly taking does not always arise from the rent being payable yearly: Atherstone v. Bostock (3); Wilson v. Abbott (4). The argument for the defendant in substance is that the lease was for one year, coupled with an implied agreement that the tenant would hold over from year to year; this in substance would be a lease from year to year, which under section 107 could not be created except by a registered instrument. In fact, this is an ingenious attempt to substitute for a lease from year to year] a tenancy for one year coupled with an agreement to renew it from year to year: Mati Lal v. Darjeeling Municipality (5). We hold accordingly that there was no "agreement to the contrary" within the meaning of section 116, and that after the expiry of the year for which the tenancy took effect, it was renewed from month to month: Debendra Nath v. Syama Prosanna (6); Durgi Nikarini v. Gobardhan Bose (7). Under section 106, this tenancy was terminable by the lessors by fifteen days' notice expiring with the end of a month of the tenancy.

As regards the second question, two objections have been taken to the form of the notice, namely, first, that the notice, which was dated the 16th Baisakh 1318 and may, for the present purpose, be assumed to have been served on that date, called upon the defendant to vacate the premises 'within' (that is, not later than) the 31st Baisakh 1318; and secondly, that the notice was signed on behalf of the first plaintiff by one Bharat Chandra De. These objections are manifestly groundless. A notice served on the 16th Baisakh which calls upon the tenant to quit on the 31st Baisakh (the last day of the month) gives the tenant fifteen days' notice, excluding the day on which the notice is served and expiring with the end of a month of the tenancy. The case of Subadini v. Durga Charan (8), upon which much stress has been laid by the defendant, is clearly distinguishable. In that case, the notice was served on the 16th Falgoon and required the tenant to quit the land on the 30th Falgoon. It was contended on behalf of the landlord that if the day on which the notice was served was taken into account, the tenant had fifteen days' notice. This contention was overruled, and it was held that he had only fourteen clear days' notice, while he was entitled under section 106 to fifteen clear days' notice. It is plain that the learned Judges took into account the day on which the notice was to expire and excluded from calculation only the day on which the notice was served. The learned Judges plainly could not have intended to use the expression 'clear days' in its technical sense that the time is to be reckoned exclusive of both the first and last days: Rex v. Herefordshire (9); Liffin v. Pitcher (10). The judgment, taken as a whole, indicates conclusively that when they laid down that the fifteen days' notice mentioned in section 106 meant fifteen clear days' notice, they never intended to hold that, in calculating the fifteen days, the day on which the notice is served as also the date on which the notice expires are both to be excluded. This is in accord with what may be taken as the well-settled rule on the subject: Doe d King v. Grafton (11); Doe d Cornwall v. Matthews (12); Poole v. Warren (13). The contention that the notice was not a fifteen days' notice to quit must consequently be overruled.

The second objection that the notice was not signed by the first plaintiff is equally untenable. Section 106 requires the notice to be in writing, signed by or on behalf of the person giving it. The notice in this case was signed by Bharat Chandra De, am-mukhtear of the first plaintiff, Haridas Saha. The power-of-atterney has not been produced, but the defendant admitted that he was the am-mukhtear. The objection is clearly untenable, as the notice was signed by an authorised agent.

As regards the third question, we have to consider whether the notice was served in accordance with the second paragraph of section 106, which provides as follows: "Every notice under this section must be in writing, signed by or on behalf of the person giving it and tendered or delivered either personally to the party who is intended to be bound by it, or to one of his family or servants at his residence, or (if such tender or delivery is not practicable) affixed to a conspicuous part of the property." In this case, attempt was made by the plaintiffs to comply with the requirements of the law by forwarding the notice to the defendant in a registered cover through the Post Office. The cover was ultimately returned to the plaintiffs by the Postal Authorities on the allegation that the addressee had refused to accept it. The cover, with the notice contained therein, has been produced in the course of the trial. There is no oral evidence to show when the cover was posted, nor has the postal peon been examined to prove when and where the cover was tendered to the defendant. The only oral evidence on the subject is a statement by the agent of the plaintiffs, who pledges his oath that he had given notice by a registered cover. The defendant, on the other hand, asserted in the course of his deposition that the cover in question had never been tendered to him. In these circumstances, the question requires consideration whether the plaintiffs have proved that the notice was tendered either personally to the defendant or to one of his family or servants at his residence at least fifteen days before the expiry of the month of Biasakh, that is, not later than the 16th Baisakh. The evidence for the determination of this question consists of the envelope and its contents (the notice). The notice on the face of it, is dated the 16th Baisakh 1318. The envelope is addressed to the defendant "Dwarkanath Patita, P. O. Narayanganj, Bhagawanganj Bazar, Nij Gadi." In a corner is the following endorsement; "from Madanganj, Gobinda Chandra Saha" (the second plaintiff). On the three postage stamps affixed to the envelope, we have what purport to be impressions of the seal of the Madanganj Post Office; each bears date the 29th April 1911 which corresponds to the 16th Baisakh 1318. We have also a very faint and almost illegible impression of the seal of the Narayanganj Post Office, dated the 29th April 1911. We have further an impression of the seal of the Madanganj Post Office, dated the 1st May 1911. In addition, we have two endorsements on the cover in the following terms: (1) "This letter returned as the addressee refused to recieve it. No. 5. 29th April, 1911." (2) "Refused and returned to sender, J. C. G. 1st May, 1911.'

The first of these endorsements is in Bengali and the second is in English. The first point for determination is, when was the letter posted? There is, as we have said, no oral evidence on the subject, and we are left entirely to the post marks on the envolope. The use of a post mark in evidence involves at least three distinct principles. In the first place, the question arises, may it be inferred from the presence of what purports to be the official mark that the mark was genuinely affixed by an officer of the Post Office concerned? This is a question of authentication and may be answered in the affirmative, though there has been some fluctuation of judicial opinion on the subject. In Rex v. Johnson (14) an objection to the use of an Irish post mark as evidence of a posting in Ireland, to the effect that "there was no evidence that either of the papers was received from the Post Office which might have been ascertained by the persons employed in that office," was not sanctioned. In Rex v. Waston (15) a post mark was held not sufficient to show posting at the place named. In Arcangelo v. Thompson (16) a post mark was assumed genuine in proving receipt of a letter in a certain year. In Rex v. Plumer (17) Post Office marks were used to show that a letter came to a particular office, and similarly in Hitchon v. Best (18) a post mark was presumed to be genuine. In Fletcher v. Braddyll (19) a Post Mistress was called to identify a post mark. In Abbey v. Lill (20) Gaselee, J., said: "Where it is disputed, it ought, perhaps, to be proved, though what might be deemed to amount to proof is not clear." In Warren v. Warren (21) the Post Master of one of the offices was called to prove the post mark. In Shipley v. Todhunter (22) and Stocen v. Collen (23) post marks were presumed genuine. But in Woodcock v. Houldsworth (24) it was said that some witness must prove the post mark. In the United States there are cases in which post marks have been presumed genuine: New Haven v. Mitchell (25); Burgess v. Clark (26). The preponderence of judicial authority is in favour of the view that what purports to be the impression of a Post Office seal on an envelope which has been posted, may be presumed to be genuine, at any rate where its genuineness is not expressly questioned.

In the second place, the question arises whether if the post mark be taken as genuine, it is evidence that the cover bearing it was stamped on the date the impression bears. The answer has been given in the affirmative. In Canning's Trial (27) a post mark, verified as authentic by the clerk, was admitted to show that the cover passed through the office on the date of the mark. In Fletcher v. Braddyll (19) a post mark was used to show that the letter existed on the date thereof. In Abbey v. Lill (20) a post mark on the cover was used to show that the enclosed letter was wrongly dated. In Stocken v. Collen (23) a post mark was used to show the hour of posting a notice. These cases show that the post mark, when proved or assumed to be genuine, implies an assertion that the date on the mark is the date of affixing it.

In the third place, on the same principle the post mark is evidence that the place or office mentioned therein was actually the place where it was affixed: Canning's Trial (27); Rex. v. Johnson (14). We may, consequently, infer from the date in the three post marks on the three postage stamps on the cover, that the letter was posted at Madanganj on the 29th April 1911. It is necessary to rely on the date in the post marks, because the mere fact that the notice is dated the 29th April 1911 does not show that it must have been posted on the same date; as was said in Phelan v. N. W. Life Insurance Co. (28), experience indicates no such uniform connection between the date of a letter and the time of its mailing as to raise an inference that a letter was posted on the day of its date.

The next question which requires consideration is, when was the cover tendered to the addressee? For this purpose it would be necessary to know the usual course of mail between the place of posting and the place of receipt, for the inference is that the article posted was delivered in due course of post: Pitts v. Hartford (29). We have here no evidence on the subject, and the Court cannot take as matters of public notoriety the running time of trains between two places on a particular day, the number of mail trains within a given time, and other like facts involved in such an inquiry: Wiggins v. Burkham (30). We are, therefore, obliged to rely upon the date in the post mark of the Narayanganj Post Office. This shows that the cover reached that office on the very date it was posted at Madanganj i. e. 29th April 1911; but it does not follow that it was tendered to the addressee on the same date; as was said in Early v. Preston (31), the date of delivery of an article sent by mail cannot necessarily be inferred from the post mark of the recieving office. This observation applies with special force to registered articles which are delivered by the Post Office only between specified working hours. The plaintiffs are, consequently, driven to rely upon the vernacular endorsement on the cover, and this leads to the question whether that endorsement is admissible in evidence. The endorsement is not signed; but it is urged that it must have been made by the peon No. 5 who was probably entrusted with the delivery of the letter to the addressee. Assume the endorsement to be genuine, but still there remains the question whether it is admissible in proof of the fact recited therein, namely, that the cover had been tendered to the addressee on the 29th April 1911 and had been refused by him. This plainly is at best a record of a statement by the peon. Such a statement would have been admissible under section 32 (2) of the Indian Evidence Act, if it had been proved that the peon was dead or could not be found or had become incapable of giving evidence or that his attendance could not be procured without an unreasonable amount of delay or expense. No foundation, however, has been laid for the reception of the evidence under section 32 (2). The only other section which deals with statements by persons who cannot be called as witnesses, namely, section 33, has no application. Nor can any assistance be derived from the group of sections relating to statements made under sepcial circumstances. It cannot be argued with any show of reason that the endorsement is admissible because it is a statement made by a public officer in the discharge of his duty; our attention has not been drawn to any provision of the Indian Evidence Act, which would make a statement admissible on such a ground; indeed, if such a ground for admission of evidence was recognised, section 32 (2) would be superfluous. The inference follows accordingly that the vernacular endorsement on the cover mentioned above is not admissible in evidence in proof of the allegation that the cover was tendered to and refused by the addressee on the 29th April 1911. But it has been argued that this view is opposed to the decision in Jogendro Chunder v. Dwarka Nath (32). That case, however, if it be assumed to have been correctly decided, is clearly distinguishable. There a suit was brought for ejectment of a tenant of an agricultural holding, and the question arose whether the tenancy had been terminated by service of notice to quit. The plaintiffs alleged that they had sent a notice to the defendant in a registered cover, duly posted, which had been returned to them by the postal authorities on the allegation that it had been refused by the addressee. The Courts below held that these facts were proved, but it does not transpire from the judgment, on what evidence this conclusion was based; both Courts, however, held that there was no service of notice, as the defendant had not opened the letter and become acquainted with its contents. The plaintiffs appealed to this Court on the ground that the bare fact of refusal to take and open the registered cover did not entitle the defendant to plead non-service of notice. In the course of the argument for the appellants in this Court, reference was made by their Counsel to section 16, illustration (b), of the Indian Evidence Act and to the cases of Papillon v. Brunton(33) and Lootf Ali v. Pearee Mohun(34); the attention of the Court was also drawn to evidence of service of notice; we have not been able to ascertain what particular evidence of service had been given, as after this lapse of time the record must have been destroyed. On the evidence on the record and on the arguments mentioned, the Court made the following observation: "The service of the notice in another form (that is, other than service by actually handing the notice) was, however, proved, having been effected by a registered letter, the posting of which was proved and which was produced in Court in the cover in which it was despatched, that cover containing the notice, with an endorsement upon it purporting to be by an officer of the Post Office stating the refusal by the defendant to receive the document. Upon the cases cited before us —Lootf Ali v. Pearee Mohun (34) and Papillon v. Brunton (33)—and having regard also to section 16 illustration (b),of the Evidence Act, we think that only a captious doubt could lead us to regard that service as insufficient." It has been argued that the learned Judges held solely on what purported to be an endorsement by an officer of the Post Office that the cover had been tendered to and refused by the addressee. If the learned Judges intended to lay this down as a matter of law, it is worthy of note that the question of the admissibility of the endorsement was not argued before them; if there was evidence to show that the peon was dead or not available, the endorsement might be admissible under section 32 (2) of the Indian Evidence Act. In the absence of information as to evidence of service of notice to which the attention of the Court was drawn, we are not prepared to treat the decision as a binding authority in support of the proposition, that an endorsement of the description now before us is admissible in evidence though the requisite conditions for admissibility mentioned in section 32 have not been fulfilled. We may further point out that the wide interpretation suggested by the plaintiffs is not justified by the authorities mentioned in the judgment. Illustration (b) to section 16 is in these terms: "The question is, whether a particular letter reached A. The facts that it was posted in due course, and was not returned through the Dead Letter Office, are relevant." This is very different from the assertion that if the letter is returned with a note thereon by the peon that it had been tendered to and refused by the addressee, the inference follows that it was so actually tendered and refused. The case of Lootf Ali v.

Pearee Mohun (34) was decided before the Indian Evidence Act came into force and cannot be treated as an authority on the question of the admissibility of evidence under section 32 (2); but the facts are so meagrely stated in the judgment that, even treated as such authority, it is quite inconclusive; all that appears is that one of the plaintiffs sent a notice to the defendant in a cover which was refused by the addressee, came back to the hands of the sender and was produced in Court. What evidence there was on the point does not appear, but we have the following observation in another part of the judgment: "that letter was forwarded to him by post duly registered and we must presume that it was tendered to him; he, therefore, cannot take advantage of his refusal to take it." The case of Papillon v. Brunton (33) was of a very different character. There the tenant posted a notice to the agent of the landlord on the morning of the 25th March 1859. The agent was in his office until 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening; he did not receive the letter, but found it the next morning. The jury found upon all these circumstances that as the letter had been posted in the morning and had to be carried from Waterloo Place to the Temple, it must have reached the office of the agent the same evening, probably after he had left. An application was made to set aside this verdict, but the Exchequer Chamber declined to grant a rule. This, again, is clearly a very different case from that of Jogendro Chunder v. Dwarka Nath (32). It may be further observed that in a case under the Transfer of Property Act, Subadini v. Durga Charan (8), where reference is made to Rajoni Bibi v. Hafisonnissa Bibi (35), it was said that service of notice by a registered letter through the Post Office is not necessarily a non-compliance with the provisions of section 106, if there is evidence that the peon tendered or delivered the notice either personally to the party or to one of his family or to his servant. In both these cases, receipts signed by the addressees were produced, and that clearly was sufficient proof of good service. The case of Ismail Khan v. Kali Krishna Mondal (36) does not carry the matter further than Jogendro Chunder v. Dwarka Nath (32). Finally, the decision in Jogendro Chunder v. Dwarka Nath (32) is no uthority for the proposition that the cover must be assumed to have been tendered to the addressee on the particular date, if any, which the endorsement may bear. Neither in Jogendro Chunder v. Dwarka Nath (32) nor in Lootf Ali v. Pearee Mohun (34) did any question arise as to the particular date on which the notice had been served. On that question no assistance can be derived from the principle embodied in section 16 of the Indian Evidence Act, namely, that when there is a question whether a particular act was done, the existence of any course of business according to which it naturally would have been done is a relevant fact. In the case before us, the plaintiffs can succeed only upon proof that on the 29th April 1911, the cover was tendered either personally to the defendant or to one of his family or servants at his residence and was refused by the defendant. The vernacular endorsement is not admissible for this purpose and cannot be treated as evidence of the events recited therein. Nor would section 114 of the Indian Evidence Act and illustration (f) thereto, which are mentioned in the case of Mir Tapurah Hossein v. Gopi Narayan (37), be sufficient to remove the difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs; even if we presume it as likely that the cover was tendered to the addressee, we cannot assume that it was so tendered on the 29th April 1911, yet such assumption is essential for the success of the plaintiffs. Proof of the fact that a letter correctly addressed has been posted and has not been received back through the Dead Letter Office may justify the presumption that it had been delivered in due course of mail to the addressee, but proof of the fact that a letter has been duly posted and has been returned by the postal authorities does not justify the presumption that it has been so returned because it has been refused by the addressee; for it may well be that it has been returned because the addressee has not been found; much less is there a presumption that the cover has been tendered to the addressee on a particular date. We may further point out that the presumption mentioned in section 114 is not a presumption of law but a presumption of fact, and where, as in this case, the defendant pledges his oath that the cover was never tendered to him, we cannot treat the presumption of regularity of official business as conclusive against him. We have finally the not unimportant fact that the cover was addressed to the defendant at his gadi or place of business; there is nothing to show that that was his residence within the meaning of section 106. We are, consequently, of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the notice was duly served on the defendant.

The result is that the decree of the Subordinate Judge is confirmed and this appeal dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.—The following tree will be of assistance in understanding the facts to which reference will hereafter be made :—

MUHAMMAD KHAN had two wives,

Musammat Mulk Bano, — Musammat Bibi Rakhia,

Inayat Ali Khan. — Taj Khan.

The family are very influential members of the Khattar tribe of the Attock Tahsil and own large landed estates in Mauza Wah. Inayat Ali Khan (whose property is now in dispute) was a Subedar in the 7th Punjabis and was about twenty-three years of age when he died on the 31st October 1910.

Shortly after his death Muhammad Ashraf Khan (also known as Kala Khan), sarbrah lambardar, informed the patwari that the deceased's son, Mahbub Ali, was in possession of his father's property and applied on his behalf (Mahbub Ali being then a child of about three years of age) for mutation of names in his favour. The patwari, on the 19th November 1910, duly reported the matter to his official superiors, and on the 7th April 1911, the Naib Tahsildar, acting upon the statements made by the said Muhammad Ashraf Khan and Muhammad Akbar Khan, Rais of Mauza Wah, sanctioned mutation of names in favour of Mahbub Ali Khan, the deceased's alleged son.

Prior to this order in January 1911, a dispute arose as to the person who should be appointed lambardar, the claimants being Taj Khan, the deceased's half-brother, and the minor, Mahbub Ali Khan, who was put forward as the son of the deceased, and in the course of the proceedings before the Deputy Commissioner, Musammat Bibi Rakhia, the step-mother of the deceased and the mother of Taj Khan, made a statement to the effect that her own son was entitled to the post, inasmuch as the minor son of Inayat Ali Khan was born five months after Inayat Ali Khan had contracted marriage (nikah) and of a mother who was a Kashmiri by birth, and it was "not consistent with the practice in the family that the son of a woman of a different tribe should be appointed a lambardar." At this time Taj Khan was also a minor and his mother was appearing on his behalf as his next friend.

The order of the Deputy Commissioner is set out at page 30 of the paper-book. In the course of it, that officer remarked—"The objection to Mahbub Ali is that his mother is said to be a woman of low caste, a Kashmiri, and hence the family members press for the appointment of Taj Muhammad. But Muhammad Ashraf Khan who is of the same branch of the family as Inayat Ali Khan, deceased, and is acting as sarbrah lambardar, asks that Mahbub Ali be appointed. On page 6 of the Customary Law of the Rawalpindi District, it is stated that amongst Khattars (to which tribe the parties belong) the sons of women of inferior rank and different tribes to their husbands succeed equally with those of the same or superior rank." As a result, the Deputy Commissioner (by order, dated 23rd March 1911) appointed Mahbub Ali Khan, lamlardar, and directed that Muhammad Ashraf Khan should continue to act as his sarbrah.

Mutation of names having been effected in favour of, and the post of lambardar conferred upon, the minor, Mahbub Ali Khan, Taj Khan, through his mother, Musammat Bibi Rakhia (alias Bahoti), on the 15th June 1911 instituted the present suit and prayed for a declaratory decree to the effect that the plaintiff was the sole heir of Inayat Ali Khan, deceased; and that defendant No. 1, Mahbub Ali, was not the son, and that defendant No. 2, Musammat Sahibo, was not the lawful widow of the said deceased.

As mutation of names had been effected before the date of suit in favour of defendant No. 1 and as possession of the deceased's property was presumably with him, it is somewhat surprising to find that no objection was taken to plaintiff's claim for a mere declaratory decree. But no such objection was taken and defendants merely traversed the plaintiff's allegations as to their respective status.

Upon the pleadings of the parties, the following issues were framed by the District Judge, viz. :—

(1) "Is Musammat Sahibo the wedded wife of Inayat Ali Khan, deceased?

(2) Is Mahbub Ali Khan the legitimate son of Inayat Ali Khan?

(3) In the event of issues Nos. 1 and 2 being found in favour of the defendants, whether according to custom, they are entitled to maintenance only and are not lawful heirs of the deceased?

(4) Did Inayat Ali Khan, deceased, by any deed or action recognize the defendants as his son and wife respectively, and can plaintiffs consequently raise no objection now on that account?

The burden of proof as regards these issues was laid upon defendants, despite the fact that mutation had been effected in favour of defendant No. 1 and there was thus the presumption arising in his favour of the correctness of the entries in the revenue papers (section 44 of the Punjab Land Revenue Act, 1887). The parties, however, were not prejudiced by this error on the part of the Court so far as the production of evidence was concerned, and it is not contended that plaintiff could have produced further evidence had it been realized that in point of law, it was for him to establish the illegitimacy of defendant No. 1 rather than for the latter to prove his legitimacy.

After a somewhat protracted trial, the District Judge delivered judgment on the 28th February 1912 in favour of plaintiff, to whom he granted the decree prayed for. The grounds upon which the learned Judge based his conclusions are, briefly, as follows:—

(a) Fakira is alleged to have been one of the witnesses who were present when the nikah ceremony between the deceased and Musammat Sahibo was performed, and yet Muhammad Ashraf (alias Kala Khan) when examined on the 1st August 1911 (page 34 of the paper-book) stated that he did not know who the witnesses to the nikah were.

(b). The evidence of Abdul Rahman, Nikah Khwan, who deposes that he officiated at the nikah, "is largely discounted by the fact that he admits having written a letter (Exhibit P 2) to the defendants' agent with regard to this marriage, saying that he knew nothing of it."

(c). No entry regarding the marriage was made in the register of marriages admittedly kept by Abdul Rahman, and the explanation of the omission given by that witness is "highly unsatisfactory."

(d). Musammat Sahibo deposes that Inayat Ali Khan came home on leave 2 or 3 days before the nikah ceremony took place, whereas his "Leave Register" (Exhibit P 5), shows that he took leave on the 15th October 1905, and the nikah could not have been performed until after the expiry of three months from the date when Musammat Sahibo was divorced by her first husband

(the 17th September 1905). Thus Inayat Ali Khan must have been at home at least two months before the nikah could have taken place.

(e). There is no mention whatever of any wife or son in Inayat Ali Khan's "Kindred Roll" (Exhibit P 5) which was verified on several occasions and finally on the 27th October 1910, a few days before his death. In that Roll, the person who is mentioned as the heir to whom his estate is to be made over is his half-brother, the plaintiff, while his mother, Musammat Tajwar Sultan, is mentioned as the person to whom his family pension is payable, no reference being made to either defendant No. 1 or defendant No. 2. Defendants have appealed to this Court and we have had the case fully and ably argued before us by Mr. Bhagat Ram Puri on their behalf and by Mr. Beechey on behalf of plaintiff-respondent. Aftercareful consideration of the arguments of these learned gentlemen and of the evidence on the record, we are unable to accept the conclusions of the District Judge. as we consider that defendants have succeeded in proving that a marriage actually took place between Inayat Ali Khan and Musammat Sahibo and that Mahbub Ali Khan is the legitimate issue of that marriage. Before proceeding to give our reasons for the finding, we may here observe that it is not now contended that a marriage between a Khattar and a Kashmiri woman is invalid or that a son born of such union would have rights inferior to those of a son born of a Khattar husband and Khattar wife. On the contrary, it is conceded that if Inayat Ali Khan actually married Musammat Sahibo and if Mahbub Ali Khan can be regarded as the legitimate son of Inayat Ali Khan, Mahbub Ali Khan must be held entitled to succeed to the whole of the deceased's property. The only two points now urged against the latter's claims are (1) that it has not been proved that a marriage took place between Inayat Ali Khan and Musammat Sahibo; and (2) that even if such marriage did take place, Mahbub Ali Khan, who was born on the 20th July 1906 (page 27 of paper-book), must have been conceived at a time when marriage between his father and mother was prohibited by the Muhammadan Law (i. e., before the woman's period of iddat had expired), and must, therefore, be regarded not as the legitimate, but as the illegitimate, offspring of his parents. We shall deal with these two questions in due order.

The first question, then, is whether it has been established that a marriage ceremony actually was performed between Inayat Ali Khan and Musammat Sahibo.

The evidence, direct and circumstantial, in support of the alleged marriage is, we consider, fairly strong. There is, in the first place, the testimony of Abdul Rahman who is admittedly one of the Nikah Khwans of the village. He deposes that he officiated at the marriage ceremony and that the witnesses who were present on that occasion were three servants of the deceased, Gaman, Jiwan and Fakira, of whom the first two are dead, and the third has given evidence on defendants' behalf. The objections urged against Abdul Rahman's evidence are:

(1) that in his letter (Exhibit P 2) addressed to the defendants' guardian ad litem he stated that he had no knowledge about the marriage; and

(2) that though he admittedly keeps a marriage register, there is no entry therein regarding this particular nikah.

These objections when carefully examined have little or no weight. The District Judge, in attaching great importance to the letter in question, which he says largely discounts the value of the witness's evidence, has overlooked the very important fact that the letter, though addressed to Kala Khan (alias Ashraf Khan), never reached the addressee and has been produced curiously enough by the plaintiff's Pleader. Abdul Rahman has explained that the letter was written at the suggestion of Musammat Gulab Jan, plaintiff's sister, and the whole tenor of the letter shows clearly that considerable pressure was being brought to bear on the writer to keep him out of the witness-box. In this connection it is noteworthy that Kala Khan, when examined on the 1st of August 1911, stated the Nikah Khwan who performed the alleged ceremony was Abdul Rahman, and there is reason to suppose that Mr. Bhagat Ram's theory that the plaintiff's friends forthwith got hold of Abdul Rahman and made him write the letter to Kala Khan, represents the actual facts. So far, therefore, from this letter telling in favour of the plaintiff, it seems to us to indicate that plaintiff's friends were actually endeavouring to tamper with the witnesses whom defendant relied upon. Then as to the absence of the entry relating to the marriage in the register, it is to be remembered that Inayat Ali Khan was a man of high caste and of an influential family while the woman with whom he contracted the marriage was a Kashmiri and the divorced wife of a man of no position. In the circumstances it is not surprising to find that as little publicity as possible was given to the ceremony which was performed in the presence, not of the husband's friends and relations, but of three menial servants. It was, we think, for this reason that no entry was made in the register and also that no mention was made by Inayat Ali Khan to his officers at the time when the entries in his Kindred Roll were filled up. The other witness who gives direct evidence in support of the marriage is Fakira, one of the three persons alleged by Abdul Rahman to have been present at the marriage. We see no reason to disbelieve this witness who gave his evidence seemingly in a straightforward manner and was in no way shaken on cross-examination. The District Judge remarks that Kala Khan made no mention of Fakira when he was asked on the 1st August 1911 the names of the persons who were present at the ceremony. No doubt this is so, but it is to be remembered that Kala Khan himself was not present on the occasion in question and it may be that he was at that time somewhat chary of disclosing the names of his witnesses to the other side. We have carefully examined the evidence of the above-mentioned two persons and also such criticisms thereon as Mr. Beechey had to offer, and we see no good ground for refusing to believe them when they state that the nikah took place and that they were present at it.

As regards the indirect evidence which lends support to the defendants' case, we have first of all the statement made by Musammat Bibi Rakhia in the lambardari proceedings. At that time it is quite clear both from her own statement and from the order passed by the Deputy Commissioner on the 23rd March 1911 that the marriage between Inayat Ali Khan and Musammat Sahibo was not challenged, and that the sole contention then was that the son of a wife who was of inferior rank and of a different tribe to her husband was not eligible for appointment to the vacant post of lambardar (see pages 28 and 30 of the paper-book).

Next, we have the admitted fact that Inayat Ali Khan's father, Muhammad Khan, actually induced Musammat Sahibo's former husband, Fakira (who is not to be confused with the witness above-mentioned). to divorce her by paying him a sum of Rs. 120. It is said that Muhammad Khan secured this divorce in order to protect his son, who was Subedar of his regiment, from possibility of harm in the event of Fakira taking action against Inayat Ali Khan under the provisions of the Indian Penal Code. We do not consider this a very plausible explanation, as we have little doubt that Fakira could have been satisfied at any time by payment of a small sum of money and was not likely to proceed to extremes against a member of the influential family to which Inayat Ali Khan belonged. There can be no doubt, nor indeed is it denied, that Inayat Ali Khan was passionately fond of Musammat Sahibo, and we see no reason to suppose that the divorce was effected for any other purpose than to enable him to marry that woman. Further, it is admitted that Mahbub Ali Khan was born on the 20th July 1906 in the house of Inayat Ali Khan at Mauza Wah, and we have the evidence of the Chaukidar, Atahia, that the entry in the Chaukidar's book relating to the birth and parentage of the child was made by him upon information supplied from the women who were present at Inayat Ali Khan's house, Inayat Ali Khan himself being then absent on service. The entry in question is printed at page 27 of the paper-book. Then, again, we have the admission of Musammat Bibi Rakhia, plaintiff's mother, that after the death of Muhammad Khan, her husband, she received a visit from Musammat Sahibo who came to condole with her and stayed in her house in Mauza Wah for 15 or 20 days. It is impossible for us to believe that a lady of the position of this witness would receive a visit of condolence from a woman who was a mere mistress of one of the members of the family or that she would entertain such a woman as a guest for the period mentioned. On solemn occasions of this kind it is a practice for women who belong to the family to pay visits of condolence to another lady of that family who has lost her husband and the very fact that Musammat Sahibo paid such a visit to the senior lady of the family is, in our opinion, a very strong piece of evidence in favour of her assertion that she was throughout recognized as the lawful wife of Inayat Ali Khan.

Again Muhammad Akbar Khan, inamkhar of Wah, who is one of the leading members of the family and has, during the trial, given evidence in favour of the plaintiff, appears to have informed the patwari at the time when the mutation proceedings were going on, that Mahbub Ali Khan was the son of the deceased owner and entitled to mutation (page 17 of the paper-book).

Finally, we find Nawab Aslam Hayat Khan, Additional District Magistrate of the Gujranwala District, who was examined on interrogatories as a witness for the plaintiff, stating that Inayat Ali Khan was his cousin; that he heard that he had been married, and that Musammat Sahibo was his lawful wife. It is true that this witness gives no direct evidence upon the point, but it is to be kept in mind that he is perhaps the leading living member of the family and that his admission that he heard of the marriage with Musammat Sahibo is an important point in defendants' favour.

There is thus, as we have remarked, good evidence, direct and circumstantial, in support of defendants' allegations. On the other hand, the one important piece of evidence in favour of the plaintiff's case, namely, the Kindred Roll (Exhibit P5), is by no means conclusive. No doubt it does not make mention of either Mahbub Ali Khan or Musammat Sahibo, but as we have already observed, Inayat Ali Khan was probably averse from publishing the fact of his marriage with a low caste woman and the omission from the Kindred Roll of any reference to them would do them no great harm. The deceased possessed a large family property in Wah and the total value of his estate in the hands of his regimental officers came to about Rs. 140. In the circumstances we are not surprised to find that he did not disclose the fact of his marriage when he was questioned about himself and his relations.

For the reasons given we hold that the nikah ceremony was actually performed between Inayat Ali Khan and Musammat Sahibo, and that in all probability it took place shortly after the expiry of her period of iddat, namely, the 17th December 1905.

The next question is whether Mahbub Ali Khan, who was born on the 20th July 1906, is the legitimate son of Inayat Ali Khan. Before deciding this question, we may here state that there is now no dispute as to the following facts, viz., (1) that Inayat Ali Khan was on very intimate terms with Musammat Sahibo even before her divorce from her first husband, Fakira and that it was on this account that Inayat Ali Khan's father, Muhammad Khan, induced Fakira to divorce his wife, (see the evidence of Musammat Bibi Rakhia, page 58 of paper-book); (2) that Inayat Ali Khan was on leave at his home from the 15th October 1905 to the 13th January 1906 (see judgment of District Judge, at page 63); (3) that Mahbub Ali Khan was born at the house of Inayat Ali Khan; and (4) that his natural father was Inayat Ali Khan. There is no suggestion that Fakira, her former husband, or any other man than Inayat Ali Khan had access to her after the date of her divorce (the 17th September 1905), and even Muhammad Akbar Khan, one of the leading men of the family and a strong partisan of the plaintiff, admits that he looked upon Mahbub Ali Khan as the son, though illegitimate, of Inayat Ali Khan. In view of the evidence upon the record Mr. Beechey accepted it as a fact that Inayat Ali Khan was Mahbub Ali Khan's natural father. We have already held that there was a marriage between Inayat Ali Khan and Musammat Sahibo, the mother of Mahbub Ali Khan, and we are satisfied that this marriage took place very soon after the period of her iddat which expired on the 17th December 1905. The result, then, is that Mahbub Ali Khan was born about seven months after the marriage in question and that his father and mother were at the time of his birth lawfully married and had had opportunity of access to each other at a time when he could have been begotten of them; indeed, it is admitted now that he was begotten of them. In these circumstances, we must accept it as proved that Mahbub Ali Khan is the legitimate son of Inayat Ali Khan [see section 112 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872; Umra v. Muhammad Hayat (1); Nur-ul-Hasan v. Muhammad Hasan(2)]. Even under the principles of Muhammadan Law, there would be a strong presumption in favour of the legitimacy of Mahbub Ali Khan as (upon our findings) he was born more than six months after the date of the marriage between Inayat Ali Khan and Musammat Sahibo [see Wilson's "Digest of Anglo-Muhammadan Law," paragraph 81 (b)]. This presumption has not been rebutted in the present case, but we need not in any case refer here to the rather vexed question whether in such matters section 112 of the Evidence Act does or does not override the peculiar provisions of the Muhammadan Law. The child was born seven months after the date of marriage and might, therefore, have been begotten after but about that date (see Lyon's Medical Jurisprudence, Chapter XXIX, Question V—" What is the earliest viable age ?").

Taking all the facts upon the record into consideration, we are compelled to differ from the findings of the District Judge and we, accordingly, accept this appeal and dismiss plaintiff's suit with costs throughout.

UPPER BURMA JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 387 OF 1912.

Present:—Mr. McColl, A. J. C.

NGA PI AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

versus

NGA KYAN THA—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Water rights—Riparian owner, rights of.

A riparian proprietor may take from a flowing stream as much water as he really requires for ordinary purposes such as for drinking, washing and so on even though he may seriously diminish the quantity available for the proprietors below him but for purposes of irrigation he can only take a reasonable amount and what is a reasonable amount must be decided according to the particular circumstances of each case.

Where it was found that the defendants-appellants took the whole of the water that reached their land for irrigating purposes and thus completely cut off the water from the plaintiff-respondent's land:

Held, that they were not entitled to take the whole of the water unless they had acquired such a right by prescription.

Mr. C. G. S. Pillay, for the Appellants.

Mr. Dutt, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff-respondent sued defendants-appellants for damages for having dammed a natural water-course flowing through his land, so as to prevent any water from reaching it. He alleged that he had suffered damages to the extent of Rs. 300. He apparently based his claim not only on his natural right but also on prescription. He alleged that for 30 years the whole of the water in the stream flowed into his land and was penned up on it by a large dam and that the defendants-appellants, whose lands are above his, irrigated their lands with the surplus water which flowed on to them owing to its being thus penned back if there was sufficient rain, but that in 1274 they had erected a dam above his land which stopped the flow completely.

The defendants-appellants contended that they had erected the dam yearly from the time of their grandfathers and that it was owing to drought and not to this dam that the plaintiff-respondent was unable to work his land in 1274. Apparently the argument was that if there had been a greater flow, water would have reached plaintiff-respondent's land in spite of the dam because the defendant-appellant admitted when giving evidence that had he not dammed the stream, the plaintiff-respondent would have got about 100 baskets of paddy from his land in spite of the drought.

The Courts below found that the defendants-appellants had not acquired a prescriptive right to erect the dam and awarded the plaintiff-respondent Rs. 300 damages.

The defendant-appellant has now appealed to this Court on various grounds. The first ground is that the lower Appellate Court erred in procedure in not duly considering that it is customary to erect bunds and that there are in fact several such bunds above the appellant's land and that these bunds had to be made for the purpose of supplying water to the lands above plaintiff-respondent's land owing to the scarcity of water.

This raises the whole question of the rights in a natural stream of the owners of the lands through which it flows. In Alexander's Case-Law on Torts the author says: "The natural rights possessed by each successive riparian proprietor in a natural water-course is a right to use the water and pass it on. He has no right to pen back the water or divert it or the like, unless he has acquired that right by an easement inconsistent with the natural right." This is too sweeping a statement and is in fact incorrect.

In Miner v. Gilmour (1) Lord Kingsdown said: "By the general law applicable to running streams, every riparian proprietor has a right to what may be called the ordinary use of the water flowing past his land; for instance, to the reasonable use of the water for his domestic purposes and his cattle, and this without regard to the effect which such use may have, in a case of deficiency, upon proprietors lower down the stream. But, further, he has a right to the use of it for any purpose, or what may be deemed the extraordinary use of it, provided that he does not thereby interfere with the rights of other proprietors, either above or below him.

"Subject to this condition he may dam up the stream for the purpose of a mill or divert the water for the purpose of irrigation.

"But he has no right to interrupt the regular flow of the stream, if he thereby interferes with the lawful use of the water by other proprietors, and inflicts upon them a sensible injury."

Thus for ordinary purposes such as for drinking, washing and so on, a riparian proprietor may take as much water as he really requires for the purpose, even though he seriously diminish the quantity available for the proprietors below him; but for the purpose of irrigation he can only take a reasonable amount, and what is a reasonable amount must be decided according to the particular circumstances of each case.

In Swindon Waterworks v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co. (2) it was held that in order to make the extraordinary use of water a reasonable use, the exhaustion of water which thereby takes place must be so inconsiderable as not to form a subject of complaint by the lower riparian proprietor and the water must be restored after the object of irrigation or other work is answered in a volume substantially equal to that in which it passed before.

In Perumal v. Ramasami Chetty (3) it was held that riparian proprietors are entitled to use and consume the water of the stream which their land adjoins for drinking and household purposes, for watering their cattle, for irrigating their land, and for purposes of manufacture subject to the conditions that the use is reasonable, that it is required for purposes as owners of the land and that it does not destroy or render useless or materially diminish or affect the application of the water by lower riparian proprietors in the exercise of their rights. This case was followed in Tha E v. Lon Ma Gale (4). In Debi Pershad Singh v. Jaynath Singh (5) their Lordships of the Privy Council said: "The right claimed by the appellants.....is neither more nor less than a right on the part of an upper proprietor to dam back a river running through his land and to impound as much of its water as he may find convenient for the purposes of irrigation, leaving only the surplus, if any, for the use of the proprietors below. In the absence of a right acquired by contract with the lower heritors, or by prescriptive use, the law concedes no such right. The common law right of a proprieter, in the position of the appellants, is to take and use for the purpose of irrigation so much only of the water of the stream as can be abstracted without materially diminishing the quantity which is allowed to descend for the use of riparian proprietors below, and without impairing its quality. What quantity of water can be abstracted and consumed without infringing that essential condition, must in all cases be a question of circumstances, depending mainly upon the size of the river or stream, and the proportion which the water abstracted bears to its entire volume."

In the present case the defendants-appellants took the whole of the water that reached their land, and it was not for ordinary purposes only but for irrigating their lands; but it has been urged that it was necessary to erect their dam as otherwise they would have been unable to work their lands and that the dam was only 3 feet long and $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet high. Whatever its size, however, this dam completely cut off the water from the plaintiff-respondent's land and whether this was the only way in which they could irrigate their lands or not, I think it is clear from the cases cited above that they were not entitled to take the whole of the water, unless they had acquired such a right by prescription, even if the water in the stream was so little that though of use to the defendants-appellants, it would have been of no use at all for irrigation purposes to the plaintiff-respondent, which was admittedly not the case. The defendants-appellants not only prevented the plaintiff-respondent from using the water for extraordinary purposes—and he had as much right to use it for such purposes as the defendants-appellants—but by their extraordinary use of it they deprived the plaintiff-respondent of his right to use the water for ordinary purposes.

The Courts below have found that the defendants-appellants had not acquired a right to erect the dam by prescription and though the 2nd ground of appeal is that the lower Appellate Court disbelieved the witnesses for the defence for inadequate reasons, I agree that defendants-appellants failed to prove that they had acquired the right they claimed. It is not even clear whether their case was that they erected a dam every year; whether there was much rain or little; or whether they only erected one when rain was scarce, and they had to prove that for 20 years they had peaceably and openly enjoyed the use of the water as an easement. Now the enjoyment of all the water would have been an easement because it would have been an act done in derogation of plaintiff-respondent's rights, but the enjoyment of the water as a natural right—and that is how the defendants-appellants appear to have enjoyed the water previously—cannot support a claim to the user of it as an easement [Chunilal v. Mangaldas (6)]. Nothing less than proof that the defendants-appellants had deprived the plaintiff-respondent of the whole of the water every year for 20 years could establish the right they claim. The dam is clearly not of a permanent nature and its building could not be an invasion of plaintiff-respondent's rights until the volume of water entering his land was sensibly diminished. It is not the erection of the dam on defendants-appellants' own land or rather in the bed of the stream that constitutes the invasion of plaintiff-respondent's right, but the stopping of the water. The defendants-appellants certainly did not prove that they had deprived the plaintiff-respondent of the use of the water every year for 20 years.

The 3rd ground of appeal need not be discussed. It was not for the plaintiff-respondent to prove that he had a prescriptive right to the use of the water; he had a natural right to it; it was for the defendants-appellants to prove that they had by prescription acquired the right to deprive the plaintiff-respondent of the water.

The last ground of appeal is that the Courts below erred in fixing the damages at Rs. 300 without allowing for expenses of cultivation and in taking the value of paddy at Rs. 150 a hundred baskets without any evidence, and it has been urged that the whole damage has not been done by the defendant-appellant as there are several dams above his. On the last point I would say that it has not been shown that these other riparian proprietors have taken more than a reasonable quantity of water and in the second place, if they too have committed a tort, the general rule is that joint tortfeasors are jointly and severally liable.

As regards the actual damage caused, plaintiff-appellant's witness Mg. Po Lat should have been a valuable witness as he is a revenue surveyor, but he declined to make any statement on the point. The lower

(6) 16 B. 592.

Appellate Court assumed that the damage caused was the value of 200 baskets of paddy because plaintiff-respondent's land ordinarily grew that amount. But it is clear that it was a bad year with little rain. It is possible that nevertheless the plaintiff-respondent would have received sufficient water to raise the usual crop but for defendants-appellants' dam, but this has not been proved and cannot be assumed especially as the defendants-appeallants were entitled to take a reasonable proportion of the water for their own lands. It was for the plaintiff-respondent to prove the amount of damage which he had suffered, and I do not consider that he proved that he could have raised 200 baskets of paddy that year. The amount admitted by defendants-appellants will be taken, viz., 100 baskets.

As the defendants-appellants did not deny that the value of 100 baskets was Rs. 150, the Courts below were right in taking it at that amount but the expenses of cultivation should have been allowed for. They may be put down at a third.

I accordingly modify the decree of the Courts below into a decree for Rs. 100 with costs on that amount in the Courts below. There will be no order as to the costs incurred in this Court.

Decree modified.

Babus Baidya Nath Dutta, Siva Prosanna Bhattacharjee and Hit Lal Guha, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the defendants in a suit for declaration of title to immoveable property and for recovery of possession thereof with mesne profits. The case for the plaintiff is that the land in dispute forms an accretion to a homestead which belonged to his maternal uncle, Raghunath Dutt, who died in 1885 and that since the death of his maternal aunt in 1898, he has become entitled to hold possession thereof. He further asserts that the homestead was rent-free mahataran land and that he is consequently entitled to hold the accretion as a rent-free tenure. The first defendant is the putnidar of the village and the second defendant is a raiyat under him. Their case is that the land does not form an accretion to the homestead of Raghunath Dutt and that the plaintiff has no title thereto. The second defendant further pleads that he had been in occupation for many years as a tenant under the first defendant. The Court of first instance dismissed the suit. Upon appeal the Subordinate Judge has reversed that decision. On the present appeal by both the defendants, the decree of the Subordinate Judge has been assailed substantially on three grounds, namely, first, that the plaintiff is not entitled to hold the land as rent-free mahataran; secondly, that if the plaintiff has any title to the land, he can hold it only on payment of rent to the putnidar; and thirdly, that the second defendant is a raiyat with right of occupancy and is not liable to be ejected. In our opinion, the decree made by the Subordinate Judge is erroneous and must be set aside.

In so far as the first question, namely, that of the title of the plaintiff is concerned, the Subordinate Judge has found that the disputed land forms an accretion to the homestead of his maternal uncle, Raghunath Dutt, which constituted a rent-free mahataran tenure. It is not open to the defendants to challenge these findings in second appeal. But the question remains, whether the plaintiff is entitled to hold the accretion rent-free on the ground that the parent tenure is held rent-free by him. In our opinion, there is no foundation for the claim of the plaintiff. Sub-section (1) of section 4 of Regulation XI of 1825 provides that when land may be gained by gradual accession, whether from the recess of a river or of the sea, it shall be considered an increment to the tenure of the person to whose land or estate it is thus annexed, whether such land or estate be held immediately from Government by a zemindar or other superior landholder or as a subordinate tenure by any description of under-tenant whatever: provided that the increment of land thus obtained shall not entitle the person in possession of the estate or tenure to which the land may be annexed to a right of property or permanent interest therein beyond that possessed by him in the estate or tenure to which the land may be annexed and shall not, in any case, be understood to exempt the holder of it from the payment to Government of any assessment for the public revenue to which it may be liable under the provisions of Regulation II of 1819 or of any other Regulation in force. There was a second proviso to the clause to the following effect, which was repealed by section 2 of the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885: "Nor if annexed to a subordinate tenure, held under a superior landholder, shall the under-tenant, whether a khodkasht ryot holding a mourasi istimrari tenure at a fixed rate of rent per bigha or any other description of under-tenant liable by his engagements or by established usage to an increase of rent for the land annexed to his tenure by alluvion, be considered exempt from the payment of any increase of rent to which he may be justly liable." On behalf of the plaintiff it has been argued that as clause (1) of section 4 of Regulation XI of 1825 stands after the omission of the second proviso, the plaintiff is not bound to pay any rent in respect of the accreted land and is entitled to hold the same rent-free in the same manner as the parent tenure. This contention is clearly fallacious. The second proviso was omitted because provision was made in section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act for the ascertainment of additional rent payable for additional land in the occupation of the tenant. It is true that the terms of section 52 are not directly applicable to the case before us. But we are entitled, indeed bound, to act under clause (5) of section 4 of the Regulation. That clause provides that in all other cases, namely, in all cases of claims and disputes respecting land gained by alluvion or by dereliction of a river or sea, which are not specially provided for by the rules contained in the Regulation, the Courts of Justice in deciding upon such claims and disputes shall be guided by the best evidence they may be able to obtain of established local usage, if there be any applicable to the case, or if not, by general principles of equity and justice. In the case before us, no evidence has been given of any established local usage applicable to the matter. We have thus to determine the rights and obligations of the parties on general principles of equity and justice. The question consequently reduces to this: Does the circumstance that the plaintiff holds the parent tenure rent-free entitle him to hold the accreted land rent-free? In our opinion, the question should be answered in the negative. It is plain from the proviso to the first clause of section 4 that in case of accretion, the proprietor himself who holds directly under the Government becomes liable to assessment of additional revenue; and the view cannot possibly be maintained on any intelligible principle of equity and justice that the properietor should be liable to pay additional revenue to Government, but that a subordinate holder under him should be entitled to hold the land without payment of rent to him. If this view were not maintained, the result might be that where a proprietor had made a rent-free grant of a small portion of land included within his estate, the rent-free holder might become entitled by accretion to hold a large quantity of land rent-free, while the proprietor might become liable to the Government to pay additional revenue therefor. No rational principle has even been faintly suggested on which a result like this can be defended. It has been argued, however, that the contention of the plaintiff is supported by a number of judicial decisions, and our attention has been drawn to the case of Miajan v. Akram Ali (1) in which Mr. Justice Geidt held that the person to whose land the accretion is formed is entitled to hold the land on the same terms as those on which the parent tenure is held. This proposition was formulated in a case in which the question in controversy was, whether a non-occupancy raiyat was entitled to claim possession of the land which had accreted to his holding, and it was ruled that he was entitled to hold the accreted land as a non-occupancy raiyat. The question which arises before us, namely, whether a rent-free holder is entitled to hold the accreted land rent-free, was not in controversy in the case before Mr. Justice Geidt. The same observations apply to the case of Gourhari v. Bhola Kaib rto(2), where it was ruled that a raiyat who had a right of occupancy was entitled to the benefit of section 4 clause (1), of Regulation XI of 1825. An examination of the judgment of this Court in the cases of Golam Ali v. Kali Krishna (3); Chooramoni Dey v. Howrah Mills Company (4) shows that the view we take is not opposed to the principle which underlies these decisions. In fact, in the decision last mentioned Mr. Justice Mitter held that the rent payable in respect of accreted land might not always be on the same footing as rent payable in respect of the original holding, and he pointed out that if in fixing the rent of the original holding lower standard than the full letting value was adopted in consideration of any bonus paid, it would be unjust to the landlord to fix the rent of the accretion at the rate of rent fixed in respect of the original tenure. This observation applies obviously with much greater force to a case like the present, where we are unaware of the reason why rent was not assessed in respect of the land comprised in the original holding. In our opinion, it is plain that although the plaintiff is entitled to possession of the accreted land, he is not entitled to hold the same rent-free. He is only entitled to a declaration that he holds the accreted land as a tenant under the first defendant and is liable to pay rent in respect thereof, the amount to be assessed in a suit properly framed for the purpose. The view we take is in accord with that adopted in the cases of Rammonee v. Oomes Chunder (5) and Ramgutty Nag v. Barodachurn Bose(6).

In so far as the second point is concerned, it has been argued that as the plaintiff is not entitled to hold the land rent-free and as he has not only never paid rent to the first defendant but has never even offered to do so, he should not be allowed a decree for mesne profits. In our opinion this contention is just and should prevail. The claim for mesne profits may well be set off against the legitimate claim of the first defendant to rent. This will govern the rights of the parties up to the date of this judgment. If hereafter the first defendant interferes with the possession of the plaintiff, he will be liable for mesne profits.

In so far as the third point is concerned, it has been argued that the second defendant is not liable to be ejected. This contention is manifestly sound. The plaintiff has contended that the second defendant did not specifically state in his written statement that he held as a raiyat under the first defendant in good faith. Some weight may be attached to this circumstance, but the facts make it plain that the second defendant is a bona fide raiyat under the first defendant. The Subordinate Judge has found that the chur formed about the year 1887. Since then, the widow of the original holder, Raghunath Dutt, never took possession of the land. The first defendant settled the land with tenants and allowed the second defendant to take possession as a raiyat. The title of the plaintiff accrued on the 2nd April 1898 on the death of his maternal aunt, and the present suit was not commenced till the 2nd April 1910, that is, on the very last day of the period of limitation prescribed by the Statute. The position consequently is that the second defendant has been allowed to remain in occupation of the land for many years and there is really no room for the idle suggestion that he is not a bona fide raiyat under the first defendant. There is also no reason why the rule laid down in the case of Binad Lal Pakrashi v. Kalu Pramanik (7) should not be applied to the case of alluvial land. As Mr. Justice Banerjee pointed out in Peary Mohun Mandal v. Radhika Mohun Hazra (8), the principle which underlies that decision is that a tenant who enters upon the land and holds under a de facto proprietor bona fide, is entitled to be treated as a raiyat, although the de facto proprietor subsequently turns out to be not the real owner. That doctrine is applicable quite as much to firm land as to alluvial accretions. We are clearly of opinion that all the grounds taken by the appellants must prevail.

The result is that this appeal is allowed in part and the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside. The plaintiff will have a decree declaring his right to hold the disputed land as a tenant under the first defendant upon payment of such rent as may hereafter be assessed in an appropriate proceeding. He will also have possession of the land by receipt of rent from the second defendant as raiyat under him. As the suit thus stands dismissed against the second defendant, the plaintiff will pay her costs both in the Court of first instance and the Court of Appeal below. As between the plaintiff and the first defendant, each party will bear his own costs in both the Courts below. The appellants are entitled to their costs in this Court from the plaintiff-respondent.

Appeal allowed in part.

In cases to which the Hindu Wills Act applies, the terms of a Will can be proved only by a reference to the Probate or Letters of Administration, as the case may be.

Sections 24 and 25 of the Probate and Administration Act lay down the rule for cases in which the original may have been lost.

No Court other than the Court of Probate is competent to hold that the Letters of Administration had been imperfectly or inaccurately drawn up, or on an investigation of the proceedings of the Probate Court to hold that the Letters of Administration have the same effect as if a copy of the terms of the Will had been annexed thereto.

Where it is conceded that either A or B is the landlord of C and A institutes a suit to recover rent from C to which B is joined as a party, if it is agreed between A and B that A is entitled to the rent, it is not open to C to invite the Court to determine whether A or B is entitled to recover rent from him.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a suit for recovery of arrears of rent. The first defendant, who is the tenant in occupation of the holding, took a lease on the 2nd January 1904 from the plaintiff's father who subsequently died on the 29th May 1904. After his death, an application was made on the 21st December 1907 by his widow for Letters of Administration to his estate with a copy of the Will alleged to have been left by the testator. In the petition it was stated that the original Will had been lost after the death of the testator, and the contents thereof were set out under four heads

SUKUMARI GUPTA v. BHARAT MANDAL.

The application was verified by one of the attesting witnesses to the Will, who stated that the testator had written out a Will and executed the same in his presence and in the presence of other witnesses. The application was not opposed and the District Judge recorded an order for grant of Letters of Administration. When the Letters were drawn up, they were described as Letters of Administration without a copy of the Will annexed. The case for the plaintiff is that under the testamentary disposition of her father she has acquired a title to the disputed land, and she also alleges an oral gift of the land in her favour by her father during his life-time. It is on this two-fold basis that she claims to recover rent from the tenant defendant. She has also joined as second defendant to the suit her mother, who took out the Letters of Administration mentioned. The tenant defendant entered appearance and pleaded that the plaintiff had not acquired a title either under the alleged gift or under the alleged Will. He further pleaded that he had been in occupation of the disputed land for a term of two years and had thereafter surrendered possession to the landlord, so that he was not liable for rent of the years claimed. The defendant also urged that the plaintiff could not proceed with the suit as she had not carried out the provisions of sections 15 and 16 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, thereby implying that the plaintiff was a tenure-holder and he himself was a raiyat. The mother entered appearance and stated that the property had vested in the plaintiff (her daughter) and that rent was payable to her. The Court of first instance held that the contract of tenancy infringed the provitions of section 48 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and dismissed the suit. Upon appeal, the Subordinate Judge remanded the case for re-trial on the merits. The primary Court then held that section 48 of the Bengal Tenancy Act was not a bar and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover rent for the years in suit. On appeal, the Subordinate Judge has held that no title accrued to the plaintiff under the alleged oral gift in contravention of the provisions of section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act, and that, as the Letters of Administrations had been issued to the second defendant, she alone was entitled to the rent. The Subordinate Judge has thus allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit, although he has found expressly that the defendant had held over upon the expiry of the term of the lease and had been in possession of the disputed land during all three years for which rent was claimed.

The plaintiff has now appealed to this Court, and on her behalf the decision of the Subordinate Judge has been assailed on two grounds, namely, first, that upon a true construction of the proceedings in the Probate Court, it should be held that the Letters of Administration had been granted to the second defendant on the basis of the testamentary disposition of her father and that consequently her title as legatee was established; and secondly, that if her title as legatee was deemed not to have been proved, the question whether the plaintiff or her mother was entitled to the rent due, could not be raised, in the circumstances of the case, by the tenant defendant.

In so far as the first ground is concerned, we are not prepared to give effect to it as well-founded. Under section 189 of the Indian Succession Act, which has been made applicable to Hindus by section 2 of the Hindu Wills Act, it is plain that no right as legatee can be established in any Court of Justice, unless a Court of competent jurisdiction in British India shall have granted Probate of the Will under which the right is claimed or shall have granted Letters of Administation with the Will or with a copy of the authenticated copy of the Will annexed. Consequently the terms of the Will can be proved only by a reference to the Probate or Letters of Administration, as the case may be. It has been argued that the Probate Court was under a misapprehension and that although the Court intended to find and did find that the terms of the last Will were satisfactorily proved, a copy of the terms was not annexed to the Letters of Administration on the assumption that a copy could be annexed of the original Will only when the original was in existence. It is not necessary for us to investigate under what circumstances the Letters of Administration were drawn up in the form in which they were issued to the second defendant. It is plain from the decision in the case of Sugden v. St. Leonards (Lord) (1), that even where the original Will has been lost and its terms have been satisfactorily proved by secondary evidence, a copy of the terms as found by the Court should be annexed to the Probate or Letters of Administration, as the case may be. A similar rule has been laid down by the Indian Legislature in sections 24 and 25 of the Probate and Administration Act. This, however, is a matter for the Court of Probate to determine, and the true remedy of the plaintiff is to get the Letters of Administration amended by that Court on the application of the second defendant. No Court other than the Court of Probate is competent to hold that the Letters of Administration had been imperfectly or inaccurately drawn-up, or on an investigation of the proceedings of the Probate Court, to hold that the Letters of Administration have the same effect as if a copy of the terms of the Will had been annexed thereto. The first ground consequently fails.

In so far as the second ground is concerned, it must, in our opinion, prevail. The property originally belonged to the father of the plaintiff. On his death, the first defendant, if he continued in occupation as a tenant, became liable to pay rent either to the second defendant or to the plaintiff. If there was no Will, the second defendant was entitled to claim rent as the widow of the last full owner. If the second defendant took out Letters of Administration, she was entitled to claim rent in her character as administratrix. If there was a genuine Will by which this property had been bequeathed to the plaintiff, she was entitled to claim rent as legatee. Consequently, it is indisputable that the rent was due either to the plaintiff or to her mother. Now, in the suit as framed the plaintiff asserts her title to the rent due. She joins her mother as a defendant, who states that rent is due not to herself but to her daughter, the plaintiff. In these circumstances, is the first defendant competent to raise the question whether the plaintiff or the second defendant is entitled to the rent? In our opinion, it is not competent to him to raise this question. If the first defendant had deposited the rent under section 61 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and had obtained a receipt from the Court, his liability would have been discharged. As there was no real contest between the plaintiff and her mother, the rent deposited could have been withdrawn by the plaintiff and the Court would not have been called upon to determine whether the plaintiff or her mother was entitled to the rent. On the other hand, if the first defendant had honestly admitted that the rent claimed was due, under section 149 of the Bengal Tenancy Act the Court might have refused to take cognisance of the plea that rent was due to the mother and not to the plaintiff unless he paid into Court the amount admitted to be due. Thereupon the Court would have caused notice of the payment to be served on the mother, and if she did not institute a suit against the plaintiff and obtained an order restraining the payment of the money, the plaintiff would have been entitled to withdraw the sum from Court. In this event also, it would have been unnecessary for the Court to determine the relative rights of the plaintiff and her mother. It seems to us to be plain in these circumstances that where it is conceded that either A or B is the landlord of C and A institutes a suit to recover rent from C to which B is joined as a party, if it is agreed between A and B that A is entitled to the rent, it is not open to C to invite the Court to determine whether A or B is entitled to recover rent from him. He is not interested in the determination of this question and he cannot be prejudiced by a decree in favour of A in the presence of B, because B would not be at liberty thereafter to hold C liable for the rent. There is a class of cases to be found in the books where it has been ruled that the validity of an instrument cannot be challenged by a stranger, as, for instance, in the case of Achal Ram v. Kazim Husain Khan (2). A similar principle is, in our opinion, applicable to the case before us. There is no room for doubt that the first defendant has throughout occupied the land and has dishonestly put forward every conceivable defence to delay the recovery of rent from him; no Court will assist him, if it can be possibly avoided, in the achievement of this object.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside and the suit decreed with costs in all the Courts. The plaintiff will have a decree for the sum claimed with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the institution of the suit to the date of realization. In view of the character of the defence taken by the first defendant, we assess the hearing fee in this Court at five gold mohurs.

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 15—Specific performance of contract—Agreement to sell—Managing member of Hindu family—Necessity—Part performance.

A person is entitled to specific performance of a contract by a member of a Hindu family to sell his share of the family property, but not to a decree for part performance. Conveyance of a portion is not such a part of the contract "as he can perform," in the terms of section 15 of the Specific Relief Act.

Where, therefore, a suit was brought for specific performance of a contract to sell entered into by the managing member of a Hindu family and the son was also made a party:

Held, that as there was no necessity to enter into the contract, it was not binding on the family and the suit could not be maintained.

Appeal against the decree of the District Court of Nellore, in Original Suit No. 10 of 1909.

Mr. T. V. Venkataramma Iyer (with him Mr. T. N. Muthukrishaa Iyer), for the Appellant:—There is no finding that there was coercion or undue influence nor is there evidence. Plaintiff was not married to Ramachandra Reddy's daughter at the time of Exhibit I. When Exhibit I was renewed by Exhibit II, Ramachandra Reddy had already given evidence. The Judge erred in relying on these circumstances. As to the adequacy of consideration findings are inconsistent. There is no evidence on the point. And there was no coercion or undue influence and the price is adequate. Plaintiff is entitled to specific performance in law.

In any event plaintiff is entitled to a decree for specific performance against 1st defendant for the whole property, leaving the question as to the binding nature of the contract against the second defendant for a separate suit. Kosuri Ramaraju v. Ivalury Ramalingam (1); Srinivasa Reddi v. Sivarama Reddi (2). The whole suit cannot be dismissed when the 1st defendant was the only party to the contract and is competent as manager to give specific performance.

Mr. T. Prakasam (with him Mr. P. Venkataramana Rao), for the Respondents:—Specific performance is an equitable relief. To refuse such a relief no coercion or undue influence need exist. It is enough if it is an unfair bargain and undue advantage is taken of the position of the defendant. Admittedly defendant was a debtor of Ramachandra Reddy and plaintiff had no means of his own. When Exhibit I was renewed by Exhibit II, it was purposely antedated to make it appear that it was done after Ramachandra Reddy gave evidence. The price need not necessarily be inadequate at the time. It is enough if the creditor puts pressure upon the debtor to make him part with the land when the price was steadily rising.

First defendant cannot be compelled to convey the whole land ignoring the 2nd defendant. The authorities relied upon do not apply to the facts of this case. In Kosuri Ramaraju v. Ivalury Ramalingam (1) the decision turned on the ground that the plaintiff disclosed no cause of action against 2nd and 3rd defendants for specific performance of the 1st defendant's contract. Both in this case and Srinivasa Reddi v. Sivarama Reddi, (2) it was not found that the contract was binding on the family. In Kosuri Ramaraju v. Ivaluri Ramalingam (1) the provisions of the Specific Relief Act were not considered. If Srinivasa Reddi v. Sirarama Reddi (2) should be construed as an authority against me, I submit that it was doubted in Ponaka Subba Rani Reddi v. Vadamadi Seshachellam Chetty (3) and Govinda Naicken v. Apathsahaya Iyer (4). It was expressly dissented from in Juturi Nagiah v. Ariparala Venkatarama Sastrulu (5). The result of the decisions is, if there is no finding that the contract was binding on the family, the father who was a party to the contract would be compelled to part with his share for the value agreed to be paid for the whole of the family land. In this case the son was a party, issue was joined and it was expressly found by the Court on evidence that the contract was not binding on the family. The father agreed to convey specific portions of the family property which he would not be entitled to do until partition. Specific performance cannot be granted even against the father's share. In none of the decisions referred to is an authority for the proposition that the question of family necessity should be fought out once again in a separate suit when it was once decided by a competent Court.

Mr. T. V. Venkatarama Iyer, in reply.

JUDGMENT.

SANKARAN NAIR, J.—This is an appeal from a decree of the District Judge of Nellore dismissing the plaintiff's suit for specific performance of a contract entered into between himself and the 1st defendant. The plaintiff's case is that the 1st defendant who had brought a suit for partition against his co-parceners for his 2/7ths share of the family properties, was in embarrassed circumstances and in order to get rid of his debts agreed to sell the plaint properties to him for a sum of Rs. 8, 429 on the 14th April 1904, Exhibit I. The properties were to be sold soon after the disposal of the suit and after he had obtained his lands on partition. This agreement was renewed on 1st August 1907. The plaintiff states that after the decree was passed in favour of the defendant, he was placed in possession of some of the lands but has not obtained possession of the rest. He accordingly prays for specific performance and for possession of the rest of the lands. The suit was originally brought only against the 1st defendant. His plea was that the agreement was really entered into between him and the plaintiff's father-in-law, one Ramachandra Reddi, as a consideration for the latter giving evidence in the partition suit which was then pending. He also pleaded that Ramachandra Reddy threatened to place obstacles in the way of his obtaining a decree, that he was thus coerced into entering into this transaction and that it is, therefore, not binding on him. He pleaded that the sale price is inadequate and that there was no necessity for him to enter into this agreement to sell his property. His son, the 2nd defendant, was subsequently made a party to the suit. In addition to the pleas advanced by his father, he said that there was no necessity to sell the lands, the agreement is not binding on him and cannot be enforced against him under the Hindu Law.

The District Judge found that there was no necessity to sell the lands and that there was no pressure by any of the creditors. He found, also, that the plaintiff was in debt himself and is not a person likely to be in possession of funds for the purchase of lands. It was also found by the District Judge that the plaintiff was not placed in possession of the lands, but that the defendants' co-parcener who was in possession of these lands delivered them to the plaintiff's relative, plaintiff's 1st witness, who is now in possession. He was apparently of opinion that the real beneficiary under the agreement was not the plaintiff himself, but Ramachandra Reddy. Whether Rs. 8,429 was a fair value for the land agreed to be sold he does not find. On these findings the suit was dismissed.

On appeal it is contended that the Judge is wrong in all his findings. It is argued that he does not find that there was coercion and the evidence does not support that plea. It is pointed out by the appellant's Pleader that when Exhibit I was executed, the plaintiff was not the son-in-law of Ramachandra Reddi and when Exhibit II was executed Ramachandra Reddi had already given his evidence. It is quite possible that the desire to secure the assistance of Ramachandra Reddy may have materially influenced the defendants in entering into this agreement. But if the consideration is not inadequate, it is difficult to say that this fact will vitiate the transaction. The evidence as to the value of the lands is very meagre. The defendants' 1st witness, who is the 1st defendant's own son-in-law, states that the wet land is worth about Rs. 500 an acre and that the dry land is worth Rs. 450 an acre. According to this evidence the value of the lands will be about Rs. 20,000. On the other hand his own 2nd witness, who appears to be a comparatively wealthy man, admits that the lands in 1911 sold at Rs. 250 an arcre and at the time of Exhibit I only at Rs. 150 an acre, and the plaintiff's 1st witness states that the price for which the plaint lands were to be sold is reasonable. Exhibit VIII shows that the other lands in the vicinity sold at about Rs. 100 an acre. In these circumstances I am not prepared to say that the consideration has been proved to be inadequate. I must accordingly hold that so far as the 1st defendant is concerned, there is no evidence of undue influence and that he has not proved that it was a hard bargain. But it is also quite clear that there was no necessity to sell the lands. The fact that for more than three years after the date of Exhibit I no creditor sued to enforce his claim, is itself strong evidence, and the defence evidence is that the 1st defendant has succeeded in paying off the other debts by selling other lands. The plaintiff's 1st witness admits that the defendants' family had about 200 or 240 acres of land, dry and wet put together. There is no evidence that any creditors were demanding payment of their debts. There is no evidence given by the plaintiff to show why it was necessary to enter into this agreement to sell the property at a future uncertain date while the lands were rising in value. There is absolutely no evidence, therefore, that it was necessary to enter into this agreement to sell. I must, therefore, hold that it is not binding on the 2nd defendant.

It is argued before us on behalf of the appellant that he is entitled to obtain a decree for specific performance against the 1st defendant. A contract can be enforced against any person who was a party to it. The plaintiff was, therefore, right in bringing the suit only against the 1st defendant and if he alone had been a party to the suit, he might have been entitled to get a decree against him without the question whether it was binding on the family of the 1st defendant being gone into. This was pointed in Kosuri Ramaraja v. Ivaluri Ramalingam (1) and in Srinivasa Reddi v. Sivarama Reddi (2). In Kosuri Ramaraju v. Ivalury Ramalingam (1) the suit was dismissed against persons other than the 1st defendant therein, who alone was a party to the contract. In Srinivasa Reddi v. Sivarama Reddi (2) the son was not a party to the second appeal. In neither case, therefore, was the question, whether the agreement was binding on the family or not, considered. Nor was the question decided whether if the agreement was not binding on the family, the plaintiff was not entitled to get a decree for the managing member's share of the property on payment of the entire purchase-money. That he was so entitled was conceded on behalf of the managing member in Ponaka Subba Rani Reddi v. Vadamadi Seshachellam Chetti (3). In fact there the argument was that he was entitled only to that relief. But in the case before us, the son has been made a party to the suit and I am not prepared to hold that after the trial of the case, we shall be justified in dismissing him from the suit, without a consideration of the pleas advanced by him. Moreover, the fact that the agreement is not binding on the family has been proved by the evidence let in to prove undue influence and the unconscionable nature of the bargain. On the finding, therefore, that the agreement is not binding on the family, the suit for a decree directing the 1st defendant to sell these lands must be dismissed.

The plaintiff offers to pay the full amount for a conveyance to him of the lands which are the separate property of the 1st defendant and of the 1st defendant's interest in the family lands. This requires a determination of the question whether any of these lands form the separate property of the 1st defendant; and such a decree will only lead to litigation between the same parties to determine their rights. We think we should not be justified in passing such a decree in this suit. He is, therefore, not entitled to a decree for part performance.

In this view it is unnecessary to consider certain dicta in Juturi Nagiah v. Ariparala Venkatarama Sastrulu (5). But as the question has been argued before us I shall briefly refer to them.

A person is entitled to specific performance of a contract by a member of a Hindu family to sell his share of the family property. But there is no question of part performance in that case. If the learned Judges intended to go further and lay down that if a junior member of a Hindu family agrees to sell any specific property belonging to his family, a decree may be passed against him to sell his share of that specific property, I am unable to agree with that view. Because the junior member is unable to perform the whole of his part of the contract by conveying the entire property agreed to be sold and for the same reason that he is not entitled to claim any specific property till partition, conveyance of a portion is not such a part of the contract "as he can perform," in the terms of section 15 of the Specific Relief Act.

On the view that a co-parcener cannot alienate any specific property, no specific performance can be decreed. The opposite view rests on the principle laid down in some of the cases that a co-parcener is entitled to alienate any particular property. Bakewell, J., and myself have dissented from those cases in Nanjaya Mudali v. Shanmuga Mudali (6) and our judgment has been followed by the Officiating Chief Justice and Kumaraswami Sastri, J., in Maharaja of Bobbli v. W. S. Venkataramanjulu Naidu (7). This question, however, does not arise in the appeal. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The holder of a mortgage-decree who has not shown a right to a personal decree against the mortgagor, cannot have a Receiver appointed of the mortgaged properties, even though the mortgagee is obstructed by the mortgagor himself from executing his decree.

Appeal against the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Cocanada, dated the 30th June 1913, in Execution Appeal No. 1370 of 1912 (Original Suit No. 60 of 1906).

FACTS.—The appeal arose out of a petition for the appointment of a Receiver. The petitioner held a compromise decree against the respondent based on two mortgage-bonds executed by the latter's father. The decree was obtained in suits brought by him against the respondent, represented by his mother, during his minority. On attaining age, the respondent instituted a suit for a declaration that the compromise decree obtained by the petitioner was fraudulent and not binding on him, as his mother had colluded with the petitioner in consenting to such a decree and as his father had no authority to execute the mortgage-deeds on which the compromise decree had been obtained, since the properties in question belonged to him and not to his father. Pending the disposal of his suit, the respondent obtained an injunction restraining the petitioner from executing his decree and bringing the suit properties to sale in execution thereof. Thereupon the petitioner applied for the appointment of a Receiver of the mortgaged properties, on the ground that he would not otherwise be able to realise the amount due to him under his decree, the respondent not having any other property and being likely to spend away the income of the said properties. The respondent opposed the application, on the ground that in the circumstances of the case no Receiver could be appointed as the petitioner had no prima facie right to the properties themselves or their rents and profits. The Court below overruled these objections and appointed a Receiver. The respondent thereupon appealed to the High Court.

Mr. B. Somayya for the Appellant :—A Receiver can be appointed only if the applicant has a present right to the whole or portion of the rents. The petitioner in this case is only a simple mortgagee and has no such right. The decisions cited by the Court below, Jaikissondas Gangadas v. Zenabai and Kazi Mahomed Miya Dada Miya (1); Khubsarat Koer v. Sarada Charan Guha (2) and Eastern Mortgage and Agency Co., Ld. v. Rakea Khatun (3), are all distinguishable, because in every one of them the mortgagee was entitled to say that the rents should be applied towards his debt. The English cases do not afford any help, because in England the mortgagee is entitled to possession of the property from the date of the mortgage. See Ashburner on Mortgages, page 297. In England, even subsequent mortgagees and equitable mortgagees have a right over the rents and profits —Ashburner, pages 297-8. In India a simple mortgagee is only entitled to bring the property to a judicial sale. Papamma Rao v. Vira Pratapa H. V. Ramachandra Razu (4). The principle is well explained by Lord Eldon in Jones v. Pugh (5); also in Davis v. Duke of Marlborough (6). See also Khubsarat Koer v. Saroda Charan Guha (2) per Mookerjee, J. The proposition laid down at page 529 and in the other cases is too broad and is based on English cases.

In some States in America the position of a mortgagee is the same as in India. In those States it has been held that even if the mortgagor is insolvent and the security insufficient, a Receiver cannot be appointed. High on Receivers, pages 826-8. In the present case we have only a compromise decree providing for one remedy. Even f the mortgaged property is insufficient there cannot be a personal decree. Hence the mortgagee has no right to ask for a Receiver.

Mr. P. Somasundaram, for the Respondent:—In the case reported in Arunachellam Chettiar v. Manicka Varaher Desikar(7), a Receiver was appointed when there was a decree for sale and the security was insufficient. In that case also the mortgagee was prevented by the mortgagor by injunction. See also Khubsarat Koer v. Sarada Charan Guha (2); Eastern Mortgage and Agency Co., Ltd., v. Rakea Khatun (3); Beni Madho Singh v. Pran Singh (8); Weatherall v. Eastern Mortgage and Agency Co. Ltd. (9). The English cases support the position. See Hopkins v. Worcestor and Birmingham Canal Navigation Co. (10), In England a mortgagee who is entitled to possession cannot get a Receiver. Hence the argument of the other side is fallacious. The respondent is entitled to a personal decree.

Mr. B. Somayya in reply:—The case in Arunachellam Chettiar v. Manicka Varaher Desikar (7) is distinguishable, because there the mortgagee was ent tled to the rents and the personal remedy was alive. Otherwise the decision is incorrect. Hopkins v. Worcester and Birmingham Canal Navigation Co. (10) is inapplicable, as there was a special agreement that rents and current income should be applied towards the debt. The principle that a legal mortgagee who can take possession at Common Law cannot ask for a Receiver is based on the special rule of Equity Courts, which prevailed before the Judicature Act, that a person who has a remedy at Common Law cannot have a remedy in Equity Courts. This rule is no longer applicable even in England after the Judicature Act. Now a Receiver is appointed at the instance of a legal mortgagee, so that he may not be in the difficult position of a mortgagee in possession. Again, a person applying for the appointment of a Receiver for certa n property must show prima facie title to it. Kerr on Receivers, pages 45, 607.

JUDGMENT.

OLDFIELD, J.—The order appealed against is one appointing a Receiver. The lower Court's statement of the facts has not been disputed, and I adopt it. Shortly, the respondent holds a compromise decree against the appellant for recovery by sale of mortgage property. That property is heavily encumbered, and, if a sale were held at once, the respondent would not be likely to realise even a tenth part of his debt. He cannot bring the property to sale, because the appellant has sued for a declaration that the compromise decree was obtained through the fraud of his guardian during his minority and has got execution stayed. Meantime interest is running. It is clear that this delay is subjecting the respondent to the risk of irreparable loss and that on general considerations his claim to provisional relief is strong. It is not denied that, when the order staying execution was made, he suggested that it should be conditional on the appointment of a Receiver, but was told to apply separately; and it is possible that the lower Court in making its order had the prospect of such an application in mind. But it is not contended that the former was conditional on the grant of the latter, and it, therefore, cannot be treated as having been so.

The appellant's argument here is as it was in the lower Court, that as the respondent's decree for sale on a simple mortgage would not entitle him to possession of the property or its profits, the Court cannot by means of a receivership give him what it could not give by way of substantive relief, and that this is not affected by the fact that he is unable to execute in accordance with the decree.

This argument is, no doubt, prima facie sustainable and the first attempt to reconcible the appointment of a Receiver with the character of the decree must be dismissed shortly. It is that, when the sale has been held and its proceeds have been found insufficient to satisfy the respondent's debt, as they are practically certain to be, he will be entitled to ask for a personal decree and a receivership of the appellant's resources in anticipation of it. There is at least one fatal objection to this, that the respondent has not shown that the personal remedy is still available to him. For it is clearly too late for him to ask for that remedy in respect of the earlier of the two mortgages he sued on, that of 1894; and it has not been shown that suing in 1900, he can claim it in respect of the later, dated 20th June 1900. The lower Court's order must then be supported, if at all, on some wider ground than the appellant's personal liability; and it may be said at once that none of the decisions, to which I shall refer, contains any reference to personal liability as its basis. Such wider ground has, in my opinion, been shown to be available in the practice, on whatever considerations it be founded, of English and Indian Courts to grant the mortgagee equitable relief by way of a receivership in cases such as the present. Thus in In re Pope (11) it was said that "the Court of Equity always acted on the principle that it would never grant a Receiver where the party applying for the Receiver had a legal right to possession. An equitable mortgagee could get a Receiver, but a legal mortgagee could not until the passing of the Judicature Act." Vide also Bodger v. Bodger (12); Hopkins v. Worcester and Birmingham Canal Navigation Co., (10) and Davis v. Duke of Marlborough (6). It is objected against the application of these English authorities that in England the mortgagee's right is either to sell or obtain possession by foreclosure and that the appointment of a Receiver in them may be understood as the anticipatory of the latter. But the appointment is not supported in any of them on that restricted ground; nor is the restriction recognised in any of the Indian cases, in which they are relied on.

In India the current of decisions has been clear in respondent's favour, for appellant has not shown that any of them were based on the decree-holder's right to possession, immediate or future, and has cited no case, similar to the present, in which a Receiver has been refused. Jaikissondas Gangadas v. Zenabai and Kazi Mohamed Miya Dada Miya (1) was referred to by the lower Court. But it is of assistance, only because In re Pope (11) is referred to in it with approval, the suit having been brought on the original side for sale or foreclosure in the alternative. Latafut Hossein v. Anunt Chowdhry (13) was, like Jai Kisoondas Gangadas v. Zenabai and Kasi Muhomed Miya Dada Miya (1), decided under the Code of 1882, though it has not been shown that any subsequent change in the law affects the argument. In the former the appointment of a Receiver was refused; but it had been applied for by the mortgagor in circumstances not resembling those before us. The facts in Ghanashyam Misser v. Gobinda Moni Dasi (14) are not given fully in the report. But it is plain that sale, not possession, was the mortgagee's remedy. It was held that there would be no obstacle to the appointment of a Receiver, if one were justified by the circumstances of the case. This authority was followed by this Court in Arunachellam Chettiar v. Manicka Varaher Desikar (7); and reference to the record in the case shows that the facts resembled those before us closely, because the decree was on a simple mortgage and its execution had been stayed. The three remaining decisions to be considered are also clearly in respondent's favour and were reached after consideration of the English practice. In two of them, though the report contains no explicit statement, it is clear that the mortgage did not transfer to the mortgagee any title to the property or present or future right to possession; and it is, therefore, to be inferred that the mortgage was (as here) simple and the remedy by sale. For apart from the facts that the transactions in question took place in the mofussil and that there is no reference to any special rights in connection with them, in Weatherall v. Eastern Mortgage and Agency Co. Ltd.(9) there was in connection with the mortgage a trust deed, to which the mortgagee Company consented but in which it did not join, by which the mortgagor vested the property and its possession in trustees to discharge the debt and interest on it from the profits. And in Eastern Mortgage and Agency Co. Ltd. v. Rakea Khatun (3) the mortgage sued on included provision for the appointment of two managers statedly on behalf of the mortgagors, who must, therefore, have retained their rights. In these cases the Court held that default in payment of interest justified the appointment of a Receiver pending trial. Lastly in Khubsarat Koer v. Sarada Charan Guha (2) appointment of a Receiver was refused, because the decree was for foreclosure. But the Court said "that if it had been for sale and it had been established that the security was not sufficient to satisfy the judgment-debt, a Receiver would have been appointed almost as a matter of course, especially if there had been default in payment of interest."

Authority being in accordance with the decision of this Court in Arunachallem Chettiar v. Manicka Varaher Desikar (7) and negativing the appellant's objection, the conclusion must be that the appointment of a Receiver was within the lower Court's powers. It was certainly justified by the circumstances. The appeal must, therefore, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The judgment-debtor is the appellant. A compromise decree for sale of the mortgaged property on failure to pay the amount agreed upon between the parties was passed in July 1907. The judgment-debtor has brought a Regular Suit No. 4 of 1912 to have that compromise decree set aside and has obtained an injunction against the decree-holder's bringing the mortgaged property to sale in execution of that compromise decree. Thereupon the decree-holder applied for the appointing of a Receiver to take charge of the properties and to receive the rents and profits and his application has been granted by the executing Court. The present appeal is against that order appointing a Receiver.

Mr. B. Somayya, who argued the case before us for the judgment-debtor with remarkable ability, relied upon several English, Irish, American and Indian authorities in support of his contention that unless the mortgagee was entitled to immediate possession of the corpus of the mortgaged property or at least to the immediate receipt of the rents and profits, the Court has no power to appoint a Receiver at the instance of a mortgagee. I do not intend to deal with these cases in detail. Most of the English cases relate to English mortgages and it is well known that the mortgagees under the English form of mortgage are in the eye of the Common Law the legal owners of the mortgaged property and are entitled, whenever they wished, to obtain actual possession of the corpus and of the rents and profits. They were at first not given the right to have a Receiver appointed through Court as they had the higher, though very inconvenient right as owners of taking possession, the inconvenience arising out of their obligation to keep correct accounts of the profits and to take due care of the mortgaged property. By legislation, the right to have a Receiver appointed through Court has been granted to them. As regards equitable mortgagees by deposit of title-deeds (I do not mean equitable mortgagees in the other sense, that is mortgagees of the equity of redemption), Courts of Equity looked upon them in all respects as if they were legal mortgagees and though Courts of Equity could not themselves award actual possession of the corpus, they appointed Receivers at the instance of the mortgagees to receive rents and profits for the benefit of the equitable mortgagees. After the Judicature Acts (see Ashburner on Mortgages, pages 297 and 298) possession can be given to equitable mortgagees provided there is no legal mortgage outstanding. Similarly in the case of 2nd and 3rd mortgagees, Receivers were appointed subject to the rights of the first legal mortgagee, as the documents obtained by the 2nd and 3rd mortgagees were also in the English form which contain a clause conveying the mortgagor's rights of ownership.

Then there are some cases where Receivers were appointed at the instance of debenture share-holders who have usually the right to be paid the interest on their debenture shares out of the annual profits of the Company.

Mr. B. Somayya argued on these authorities that it was the fact that mortgagees and debenture share-holders had an interest in, or charge on, the rents and profits that gave the power and jurisdiction to the Court to appoint a Receiver for their benefit. I think, however, that he put the matter too high in so stating the proposition. The circumstance to which he referred had undoubtedly the effect of making the Courts readier to grant the application for receivership, as "justice and convenience" could readily be shown to be promoted by the appointment of a Receiver in such cases: but I do not think that that circumstance, namely, the existence in the plaintiff of a right to receive rents and profits or of a charge in his favour on the rents and profits is the indispensable pre-requisite for the exercise of the Court's power to appoint a Receiver. The new Civil Procedure Code, Order XL rule (1), [following the Judicature Act of 1873, section 25 (8)] gives the widest power to a Court to appoint a Receiver of "any property" whenever it appears to the Court to be "just and convenient," whereas the old section 503 gave power to the Court to appoint a Receiver only when it was "necessary for the realization, etc.," of a property, "the subject of a suit or attachment." The learned commentators, no doubt, throw out a suggestion in Woodroffe and Ameer Ali's Civil Procedure Code, page 1196, that though the words "any property" are used in Order XL, rule (1), it must be the subject of a suit or attachment. But I do not see why such a restriction should be placed.

In Arunachellam Chettiar v. Manicka Varaher Desikar (7) it was held that (as I understand the judgment) (1) where the mortgagee decree-holder was prevented by an injunction (as in this case) from bringing the property to sale, (2) where the security was insufficient for the realization of the decree amount by its sale alone (again as in this case) and (3) where added to the above two facts for the balance of the decree after the sale of the mortgaged property, a supplement decree against the defendant for the balance of the decree amount to be realised by the attachment and sale of his other properties could be passed, the Court had the power to appoint a Receiver for the rents and profits of the mortgaged property in order that the accumulated rents and profits might be available to the decree-holder for the attachment if and when he obtains his supplemental decree. I am, therefore, clear that Mr. Somayya's first contention is stated too widely and cannot be accepted.

His next contention was that under the terms of the decree in the present case the decree-holder is not entitled, after the sale of the corpus of the mortgaged property, to get a supplemental deree for recovery of the balance of the decree amount by proceeding in execution against other properties of the judgment-debtor and that, therefore, the appointment of a Receiver for the purpose of preserving the rents and profits in order that they may be available to the decree-holder for attachment in execution of a further supplemental decree, is futile in this case and ought not to have been granted.

Having considered the terms of the compromise decree carefully and having regard to the fact that the remedy against the other properties appears, prima facie, barred on the date of the suit so far as the amount due on one of the two mortgage-deeds on which the suit was brought is concerned and that it is not clear that such a remedy is not barred even as regards the sum due on the second document and that it is also an arguable point whether a compromise decree for sale of the mortgage properties can be followed by a supplemental personal decree for the balance of the decree amount, I have come to the conclusion that this was not a fit case for the appointment of a Receiver of the rents and profits. This aspect of the case seems not to have been brought to the notice of the lower Court. The learned Sub-Judge assumes that the respondent is entitled to "proceed" against other properties of the judgment-debtor for "realising the entire balance that may be due to him (the decree-holder) after the sale of the above mortgaged villages" and that hence, "it is but just to take steps to preserve the rents of the villages for the benefit of the petitioner from loss." But, as I said above, the assumption is, prima facie, a mistaken one. Of course, if the corpus itself is likely to deteriorate by acts of waste threatened by the judgment-debtor, a Receiver could be appointed; but there is no such allegation in this case.

As to the hardship on the decree-holder, who is prevented by an injunction from bringing the mortgaged properties to sale while further being unable to get a Receiver appointed through its being doubtful whether he is entitled to a supplemental decree after the sale of the mortgaged property, I have little doubt that when this hardship is pointed out, any application he might make in the new suit for the dissolution of the injunction granted at the instance of the plaintiff in that suit (the judgment-debtor herein) will be favourably considered by the Court which granted the injunction.

In the result, I would set aside the lower Court's order. Under these circumstances I would direct the parties to bear their respective costs in both Courts.

BY THE COURT.—In the result the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), s. 78—Affixing of pattas to land necessary.

DIGAMBAR DAS v. HARENDRA NARAYAN PANDEY.

In order that a distraint under section 78 of the Madras Estates Land Act should be valid, it is not enough to show that the pattah was either tendered to the tenant or affixed to his house. It must also be shown that it was affixed to a conspicuous part of the land.

JUDGMENT.—Following the decision in Zamindary of Sivagiri v. Micheal alias Sankaralingam (1), we must hold that mere offer of the patta to a tenant who refuses to accept it is insufficient, unless followed by affixment to a conspicuous part of the land. The pattas in the present cases were admittedly affixed, not to a conspicuous part of the lands, but to the tenants' houses. The provisions of section 78 of the Madras Estates Land Act have not been complied with, and the plaintiffs must be given decrees for setting aside the attachments. Each side will, however, bear their own costs throughout.

A suit by a putnidar who is not a zemindar, for a declaration that the defendant putnidars had fraudulently caused certain land to be recorded as their lakheraj in the Record of Rights, is barred by sections 25 and 25 A of the Sonthal Parganas Settlement Regulation, 1872.

A putnidar is not a proprietor within the meaning of section 25*A*.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge of Dumka, dated the 12th November 1910, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge of Pakur, dated the 15th August 1910.

Babu Tarak Chandra Chakrabarty, for the Appellant.

Babu Nares Chandra Sinha, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff in this case claims that he is a putnidar to the extent of one-third and that the defendants are putnidar to the extent of the remaining two-thirds of a property. He complains that the defendants have fraudulently had certain land recorded as their lakheraj in the Record of Rights. The Courts have held that the suit is barred by sections 25 and 25A of the Sonthal Parganas Settlement Regulation, 1872. The plaintiff appeals. It appears to me that the decision of the Court below is correct. Section 25 of the Regulation provides: "The Record of Rights shall be conclusive proof of the rights and customs therein recorded other than the rights mentioned in section 25A." Section 25A provides: "Where only the rights of zemindars and other proprietors as between themselves are concerned a suit may be brought in a Civil Court." It is admitted that the plaintiff is not a zemindar. The only question is whether he and the defendants are proprietors. The word "proprietor" is not defined in the Act; but having regard to the Bengal Tenancy Act, which deals more or less with similar matters, it would seem that a putnidar is not a proprietor. Reference may also be made to the Bengal Land Registration Act, 1876. The learned Pleader for the appellant has not shown us any authority for holding that a putnidar is a proprietor within the meaning of section 25A of the Regulation and, in our opinion, he is not a proprietor.

That being so, the decision of the Court below is right and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 254, 255, 345—Offence compoundable without sanction of Court—Presentation of petition of compromise—Power of Court to alter charge—Acquittal—Trial—Inquiry.

Where a Court has drawn up a charge of an offence compoundable without sanction of Court and this charge, having been read and explained to the accused, has been pleaded to, that Court should, upon the presentation to it of a petition of composition by the person mentioned in the last column in the table in section 345, Criminal Procedure Code, at once accept the petition and acquit the accused and has no power to alter the charge already drawn up.

Obiter:—When the charge has been drawn up and read and explained to the accused and he has pleaded, the "inquiry" becomes a "trial".

Petition, under section 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, for revision of the order of the Additional Sessions Judge of the Shahpur Division, at Lyallpur, dated the 12th of January 1914, affirming that of the Magistrate, First Class, Jhang, dated the 22nd of December 1913, convicting the petitioners.

Mr. Badr-ud-Din Kureshi, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Herbert, for the Assistant Legal Remembrancer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This case has been referred to a Full Bench as it appeared to require careful treatment and an authoritative decision. The facts are simple in so far as they affect the question referred, and they may be stated thus. On 20th November 1913, seven accused persons being before the Magistrate, he heard evidence and drew up against them charges under section 447 and section 342, Indian Penal Code, the offences punishable under these sections being compoundable. Accused were called upon to plead and pleaded, not guilty. The case was adjourned for further cross-examination of the prosecution witnesses and was still pending, when on 3rd December 1913 complainant put in a razinama. The case was adjourned to 4th December on which day complainant was examined, and the 16th December was fixed "for argument." On that day the Court recorded an order that the charges should have been under section 147, Indian Penal Code. They were, therefore, altered accordingly; and the offence of rioting not being compoundable, sanction to the razinama was refused, and in the end the Magistrate convicted all the accused persons and sentenced each to nine months' rigorous imprisonment.

In appeal to the Sessions Court the point was taken, inter alia, that the complainant having filed a razinama, the accused should have been acquitted, the proceedings following the presentation of that document being null and void. This plea the learned Additional Sessions Judge rejected on the strength of a case in which similar procedure had been followed by a Magistrate and approved by the Sessions Judge, the conviction being finally upheld by the Chief Court. In connection with this we would remark that that case came up here on revision, and that the Judge who dealt with it expressed no definite opinion on the correctness of the procedure, but declined to interfere, apparently because he thought substantial justice had been done. In the present instance it does not appear that there are any special reasons for declining to interfere, and the point is one of importance.

We have heard Mr. Herbert in support of the lower Court's view and Mr. Kureshi against it. The way we look at the matter is this. Under section 345 (1), Criminal Procedure Code, offences punishable under section 447 and section 342, Indian Penal Code, may be compounded by the person in possession of the property trespassed upon and the person confined respectively, under both of which descriptions it is not denied that the present complainant comes. Then sub-section (6) says that "the composition of an offence under this section shall have the effect of an acquittal of the accused."

Further, sub-sections (1) and (2) show that while the sanction of the Court is required to composition of offences falling under certain sections and while sanction is required in the peculiar circumstances mentioned in sub-section (5), no such sanction is required when the offence comes under section 447 or section 342 and the case is still under trial in the Court of first instance. Then, see sections 254 and 255, Criminal Procedure Code

HASTA v. EMPEROR.

When the charge has been drawn up and read and explained to the accused and he has pleaded, the "inquiry" becomes a "trial." But the law says, as we have seen, that a composition under section 345, Criminal Procedure Code, shall have the effect of an acquittal; and we are of opinion that the composition is complete immediately complainant puts it forward in Court: cf. Kasum Bewa v. Bechu Bewa (1), in which it was held that a petition of composition once put in cannot be withdrawn. In short, when the petition of composition is put in, the case is at an end, and the Court's sole remaining duty and sole remaining function is to record a formal order of acquittal and to set the accused person at liberty. It should at once proceed to do so, it being obligatory on it to accept the compromise and to give effect to it—see dictum to this effect in Kusum Bewa v. Bechu Bewa (1), already quoted, and in Mahomed Ismail v. Faizuddi (2). We do not think at such a stage it can sit down and consider whether the charge it itself has drawn was appropriate or not, much less proceed to alter that charge and go on with a case which has wholly passed out of its hands.

Mr. Herbert, adverting to section 227, Criminal Procedure Code, suggests that the Court could under that section alter the charge "at any time before judgment is pronounced," and, therefore, still had power to do so in the present case notwithstanding the petition of composition. For two reasons we are inclined to withhold our assent to this suggestion. In the first place, apart from the technical meaning of the word "judgment," it is hardly correct to allow a Court, by a too liberal interpretation of section 227 aforesaid, to go behind what the law has pronounced equivalent to an acquittal and to re-try a case already ended. Section 403 (1) of the Code, in our opinion, prevents a re-trial, even on a different charge, of the same persons on the same facts after an acquittal still in force. Secondly, it is more than doubtful whether the final order of acquittal on a petition of composition is a "judgment:" cf. provisions in section 367 (1) as to "contents of judgment," and Mir Ahwad Hossein v. Mahomed Askari (3), where it was laid down that an order of discharge by a Magistrate under section 253, Criminal Procedure Code, upon a withdrawal of the complaint by the complainant was not a "judgment" within the meaning of that section. The "discharge" in that case, if the offence was compoundable, would have had the effect of an acquittal as here; and either way the applicability of that ruling to the present case is clear enough.

Cases like Emperor v. Asmal Hasan (4) and Emperor v. Hira Singh (5), quoted by Mr. Herbert, have little or no relevancy here. In the former the Police sent up, under sections 325/511, Indian Penal Code (compoundable with sanction of Court), a batch of persons exceeding five, whose offence, if any, certainly came under section 148, Indian Penal Code (non-compoundable). A petition of composition was put in by the complainant and was allowed; but the High Court properly pointed out that the discretion allowed in connection with section 325 had in the circumstances of the case been wrongly exercised, and, further, that the real offence committed was a non-compoundable one. The difference between that case and the present one lies in this, that here charges covering compoundable offences had been actually drawn up and read and explained to the accused persons and had been pleaded to, while there no charge had yet been drawn up and the Magistrate was not tied down to the sections quoted in the chalan, but had yet to consider what, on the record, was the substantive offence disclosed by the evidence. In the Punjab case of 1907 (5), on the other hand, certain persons having been chalaned under section 147, Indian Penal Code, the Magistrate, having taken no evidence as yet and thus having no material for deciding on the facts, accepted a petition of composition on the ground that probably the case would turn out to come under section 323, section 324 or section 325, Indian Penal Code. Naturally the Chief Court refused to allow such an order to stand; but the case is clearly no guide for us here.

It is unnecessary to labour the point further. We think the answer to the refer-

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 75—Previous conviction, proof of, when admissible—Relevancy of previous conviction—Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 54, 165.

The proof of a previous conviction, not contemplated by section 75 of the Indian Penal Code, may be adduced, provided the previous conviction is relevant under the Indian Evidence Act.

Where the previous conviction of an accused is relevant with reference to the question whether the provisions of section 562 of the Code of Criminal Procedure would apply to his case and where it is also relevant on the question of punishment, a Court is justified in taking it into consideration in deciding the question of punishment after the accused is found guilty.

JUDGMENT.

HEATON, J.—This is an appeal against a conviction for using criminal force to deter a public servant from the discharge of his duties. The offence consists in this, that the two accused succeeded in preventing the arrest of a person who was believed to be taking part in traffic in cocaine. The two accused were sentenced and we are dealing with the appeal of one of them.

On the evidence, I think, the Magistrate was right in holding that the offence was committed. The chief question argued is this: Is a previous conviction one of the matters which a Court is permitted to consider in imposing sentence? The imposing of sentence is, within the wide limits allowed by the law, a matter of discretion; it is not a matter of proof. That is, it is a matter within the sphere, not of evidence, but of penology. Section 54 of the Indian Evidence Act is a part of the law of evidence, not a part of the penal law. It regulates what is relevant for the purpose of proof at the inquiry or trial, not what is relevant for the purpose of deciding whether a long or a short sentence should be imposed. Its purpose is quite plain; ordinarily evidence of bad character, including a previous conviction, is irrelevant to help to establish an accused person's guilt. But the law of evidence does not define or profess to define those matters which a Court should consider in using its discretion in passing sentence. What these matters are to be is largely left to practice and to the common sense and knowledge of the world of the Court. Where they are definitely indicated, this is done in the Indian Penal Code and the law of Criminal Procedure, the Whipping Act and so forth; most emphatically not in the Law of Evidence. One might as reasonably, I think, look to the Law of Evidence for information as to the maximum sentence to be imposed. In my judgment, therefore, to apply section 54 of the Indian Evidence Act to the matter now before us is as much out of place as to apply, say, the Hindu Law to an European's Will. Of course, the previous conviction, if it is to be taken into account, must be proved to the satisfaction of the Court, and in the matter of proving it, it may be that the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act apply. I do not wish to express any opinion on that point.

Having regard to the previous conviction, I think that the sentence imposed in this case is appropriate to the offence and I would dismiss the appeal and confirm the conviction and sentence.

SHAH, J.—I agree that the conviction and sentence must be confirmed in this case. The conviction is undoubtedly right. We took time to consider the question of sentence. It is argued by Mr. Velinkar that the sentence must be based upon materials which are relevant under the Indian Evidence Act, and that the previous conviction which is taken into consideration by the lower Court is irrelevant under section 54 of that Act.

The previous conviction is used in this case, not for the purpose of affecting the punishment to which the accused is legally liable, but merely to influence the Court in determining the amount of punishment which it should award. The conviction in this case is under section 353 of the Indian Penal Code, and the previous conviction in question was for assaulting an Abkari sepoy on the 5th August 1905,—apparently under section 353 of the Indian Penal Code. I think that under section 165 of the Indian Evidence Act the judgment must be based upon facts declared by the Act to be relevant and duly proved. Under the Criminal Procedure Code the judgment or the particulars to be recorded by a Presidency Magistrate would include the punishment to which the accused is sentenced. It is clear that the sentence must be based upon facts which are relevant under the Indian Evidence Act. I am, however, unable to accept Mr. Velinkar's argument that under section 54 a previous conviction is irrelevant, just as the fact that the accused person has a bad character is irrelevant. His contention in effect is that the expressions "bad character" and "previous conviction" are mutually convertible terms within the meaning of section 54. If the section, as it is now and as it was before the Amending Act III of 1891, be carefully read, it seems to me clear that these expressions cannot be treated as having exactly the same meaning and scope. Though the fact of bad character is irrelevant except as provided in the section itself, it does not follow that a previous conviction is similarly irrelevant.

The case of Emperor v. Duming (1), which is relied upon by Mr. Velinkar in support of his contention, is really not in point. There the evidence of a previous conviction was admitted before the conviction of the accused of the offence charged; and the observations in the judgment have relation to that fact. The question raised in this appeal, viz., whether after conviction the proof of a previous conviction not covered by section 75 of the Indian Penal Code can be given, did not arise and could not have been considered in that case.

I have also considered the provisions of section 348 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in connection with this point. In my opinion the section does not touch the point, that has been argued in this appeal.

It follows that the proof of a previous conviction not contemplated by section 75 of the Indian Penal Code may be adduced provided the previous conviction is relevant under the Indian Evidence Act. The whole question, therefore, is whether the previous conviction in question is relevant under the Act. It is certainly relevant with reference to the question whether the provisions of section 562 of the Code of Criminal Procedure would apply to this case, and it seems to me to be otherwise relevant on the question of punishment. The lower Court was justified in taking it into consideration in deciding the question of punishment after the accused was found guilty. I do not say that any previous conviction not covered by section 75, Indian Penal Code, is relevant to the question of sentence. But the question of relevancy of a previous conviction not falling under section 75, Indian Penal Code, must be considered and decided in each case as it arises with reference to the circumstances of that case.

Appeal dismissed.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 112—Legitimacy—Presumption—Non-access—Impotence—Question of paternity one of evidence only.

The presumption created by section 112 of the Evidence Act can only be rebutted by proof of non-access, and to prove non-access, the evidence must be such as to exclude all doubt. If the husband has had access, adultery on the wife's part will not justify a finding of illegitimacy.

Proof of impotence would be equivalent to proof of non-access.

Where the point for decision is one of evidence (e.g., paternity) only, the case would be governed by section 112 and not by the personal law of the parties.

The question of a child's paternity is not one of succession, inheritance, marriage, or caste, or any religious institution or usage, within the meaning of section 13 of the Burma Laws Act, 1898.

Mr. S. Mukerjee, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Vasudevan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Respondent applied for maintenance for a child of which she alleged the applicant to be the father. She was a married woman living with her husband, Nga Pauk Kyaing, to whom she had been 20 years married without getting a child. Then, as she says, she fell in love with the applicant in 1270 B. E., and two months afterwards became pregnant by him of the child in question. She continued to live with her husband until two months after the birth of the child, when the husband divorced her. She stated in evidence that from the time when she began to have intercourse with the applicant, she did not allow her husband to approach her.

He, Nga Pauk Kyaing, examined as a witness on respondent's behalf, said that he did not approach his wife from the time she became pregnant though she continued to live in his house, and again that from the time respondent and applicant were accused of having intercourse with each other, respondent would not allow him to approach her, and that this was before respondent was pregnant. He also stated that respondent continually told him that the child with which she was pregnant was not his, and that (after the birth of the child) he tried to catch the applicant and watched and caught him sleeping with the respondent in his house when applicant said, "This is my wife and son, what has it got to do with you," that the headman told him not to take the matter further, and that he accepted Rs. 25 from the applicant as damages.

The midwife stated that the applicant promised to pay for her services when the child was born, and told her not to ask for money from the husband as the child was his, applicant's. This witness is a cousin of respondent's.

Applicant admitted that he had intercourse with the respondent when the child was one year old but not before that, and he denied that he was the father of the child, but admitted that he had to pay, as he said, Rs. 100 to the respondent's husband, Pauk Kyaing. This was all the evidence in the case which it is necessary to mention.

The Magistrate found that applicant was the father of the child. He was assisted to this conclusion by the remarkable similarity of feature which he observed between the child and the applicant. He did not refer to section 112 of the Evidence Act.

It is now contended on behalf of the applicant that the provisions of section 112 of the Evidence Act were opposed to the Magistrate's finding, and also that there was no clear and conclusive evidence as to the applicant having been the father of the child.

It is unnecessary to discuss the evidence as to applicant being the father. Section 112 of the Evidence Act, in my opinion, must be held to decide the case. It reproduces a rule of the English Law, and the principle on which it is based has been stated to be that it is undesirable to inquire into the paternity of a child when the mother is a married woman and her husband has had access to her. If the husband has had access, adultery on the wife's part will not justify a finding of illegitimacy. The presumption created by the section can only be rebutted by proof of non-access, and to prove non-access, the evidence must be such as to exclude all doubt. Unless it is proved that there has been no opportunity of sexual intercourse between the husband and wife at any time when the child could have been begotten, the presumption is not rebutted. The authorities for these statements are given in Messrs. Ameer Ali and Woodroffe's notes to section 112 and need not be cited here.

It has been contended on behalf of the respondent that the husband was impotent. On the other hand, Field's Commentary on section 112 has been referred to on behalf of the applicant, where it is suggested that section 112 does not permit, as the English Law does, proof of impotence. But on this point, Messrs. Ameer Ali and Woodroffe in their commentary say: "There can be as little access when the husband is impotent though present, as when he is capable though absent. It is clear that there was no intention to depart from the English rule on the point." This is a reasonable interpretation, and I am of opinion that proof of impotence would be equivalent to proof of non-access. But there is no proof of impotence here. It cannot be inferred from the fact that respondent and Pauk Kyaing had been married 20 years without children that Pauk Kyaing was impotent. Phenomena of this kind are met with every day where there is no impotence.

The point for determination then is simply whether it was proved that the respondent's husband had no opportunity of sexual intercourse with her at any time when the child might have been begotten. The only evidence on the point is that of respondent herself and her husband which I have summarised above. According to English Law this evidence would not have been admissible, but the Evidedce Act does not exclude it. It is, however, in my opinion insufficient. Assuming it to be true, it is to be inferred from what both the witnesses say that sexual intercourse between respondent and her husband continued until the time when respondent began to allow intercourse to the applicant, and the pregnancy was recognized within two months of that time. It is obvious from this fact that the husband might perfectly well have been the father. But I find it difficult to credit the statements made by the witnesses as to Pauk Kyaing not having approached the respondent during the many months—some 10 or 11 months it must have been—they professed to have lived together without such intercourse. The opportunity was manifestly there, and the presumption is that there was intercourse. In short, non-access was not satisfactorily proved. This settles the point.

On behalf of the respondent, it has been further contended that according to the Manugye, section 80 (Richardson's Edition, page 319), the child in question, being a child begotten secretly in adultery, the wife remaining with her husband, is not entitled to inherit and, therfore, must be held not to be the child of the husband. The contention is that the Buddhist Law being applicable to questions of marriage and inheritance, section 112 of the Evidence Act must be held to have no application. On this point, Messrs. Ameer Ali and Woodroffe in their commentary on section 112 have some remarks (see 5th Edition, page 703 and note). Apparently when the point for decision is one of evidence only, the case would be governed by section 112 and not by the personal law of the parties. But here, in my opinion, there is no doubt; the question is not only one of evidence as to paternity, it is not one of succession, inheritance, marriage or caste or any religious institution or usage, the only cases in which the Buddhist Law is applicable (see Burma Laws Act, 1898, section 13). The marriage between respondent and Pauk Kyaing being still subsisting at the time when the child was born and it not being shown that the husband had no access to his wife at the time when it might have been begotten, the law does not allow inquiry to be made as to the child's paternity, and the finding of the Magistrate that the applicant was the father cannot be sustained.

The Magistrate's order is set aside and the respondent's application is dismissed.

Application dismissed.

EMPEROR THROUGH Musammat SHAHZADA BEGAM—PROSECUTOR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 488—Maintenance—"Neglects or refuses to maintain his wife," applicability of.

The expression "neglects or refuses to maintain his wife" in section 488, Criminal Procedure Code, does not apply where the husband states that he is willing to maintain his wife and the wife deposes that she is willing to live with her husband but he refuses to maintain her.

Case reported by the Sessions Judge of the Attock Division, with his No. 305J., dated the 12th of May 1914 under section 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898.

FACTS.—Musammat Shahzada Begam, wife of Phula Khan, petitioner, applied for a maintenance order against her husband alleging that he had refused to maintain her.

The petitioner by W. W. Powell, Esquire, exercising the powers of a Magistrate of the first Class in the Attock District, was ordered, by order dated 17th March 1914, under section 488 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to pay Rs. 5 per mensem as maintenance to his wife, Musammat Shahzada Begam, which was to be payable from the date of the application.

GROUNDS.—One Musammat Shahzada Begam, the wife of Phula Khan, applied for a maintenance order under section 488, Criminal Procedure Code, against her husband, who appeared in obedience to the summons issued on her application and stated that he was willing that she should live with him. The Sub-Divisional Officer, Pindigheb, in whose Court the proceedings were, gave Phula Khan time in which to arrive at a compromise with his wife. The parties subsequently appeared and asked for further time to compromise, but Phula Khan also applied for an inquiry by the Magistrate. The Magistrate referred the matter to Pir Ghulam Abbas for inquiry under section 202, Criminal Procedure Code. A report was submitted, but the Magistrate then proceeded to inquire into the matter himself.

He had, however, no authority to refer the matter for inquiry as the application, not being a complaint of offence within the meaning of section 4 (b), Criminal Procedure Code, the provisions of section 202, Criminal Procedure Code, were inapplicable. During the inquiry Phula Khan, who admitted Musammat Shahzada Begam was his wife, stated that he was willing to maintain her. She also stated that she was willing to live with her husband, but contended that he refused to maintain her.

The Magistrate was of opinion that Phula Khan's offer to maintain his wife was not made in good faith, and held that notwithstanding this offer, there were just grounds for making a maintenance order and fixed Rs. 5 per mensem as an equitable allowance. Phula Khan has applied for revision of this order granting maintenance.

Before a maintenance order could have been made, it should have been made to appear that Phula Khan refused or neglected to maintain Musammat Shahzada Begam whom he admitted to be his wife, whereas he offered to maintain her and she consented to live with him. In these circumstances, her application should have been dismissed or permission should have been given her to withdraw it. The Magistrate's order, therefore, appears to be wrong and I forward the case to the Chief Court with the recommendation that it be set aside.

Mr. Nand Lal, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Fazal Ilahi, for Musammat Shahzada Begum, complainant.

ORDER.—The sole question in this case is whether the husband "neglects or refuses to maintain his wife" within the meaning of section 488, Criminal Procedure Code. It appears from the record that the husband stated that he was willing to maintain his wife. The wife stated that she was willing to live with her husband but contended that he refused to maintain her. Even the Magistrate who made full inquiry into the matter expressed his opinion that it was "really a difficult matter to decide whether it is the accused who refuses to maintain complainant or whether it is the latter who refuses to be maintained." In view of the above opinion and the statements of the parties, I agree with the Sessions Judge in holding that it is not proved that the husband neglected or refused to maintain his wife.

I accordingly accept the revision and set aside the order of the Magistrate directing the husband to make a monthly allowance of Rs. 5 for the maintenance of the wife.

Revision accepted.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 345—Compounding a case—Written compromise signed byboth parties put in—Magistrate, whether entitled to call for further evidence.

Where the parties are entitled of themselves to compound a case and put in a written paper signed by themselves stating that the offence is compounded, they have proved that the offence is compounded and a Magistrate is not entitled to call for further evidence to prove it.

Criminal reference made by the Additional Sessions Judge of Poona.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

HEATON, J.—In this case as disposed of by the Magistrate, three persons were convicted of the offence of hurt under section 323 of the Indian Penal Code. One was sentenced to a fine of Rs. 100, the other two to a fine of Rs. 50 each. The one on whom the appealable sentence was imposed appealed, and the conviction was reversed on the ground that the offence had been compounded. We hold that the Sessions Judge very properly sent the case to us, submitting that the convictions of the accused of the two non-appealable sentences may also be set aside.

We have not—of course it is not usual to have—the explanation of the Magistrate for his proceedings, and in the absence of any explanation I confess I do not understand them and find some difficulty in dealing with them. There is no doubt whatever that the complainant and the accused put in before the Magistrate a writing signed by them, in which the complainant states that she does not wish to proceed and that the case has been compounded. There is no doubt seeing that this was a case of hurt, that the complainant could compound the case without the permission of the Court. But the Court, as I understand it, came to the conclusion that its own permission was needed, that is, unless I have misunderstood, the purport of the Magistrate's judgment. He seems to have come to this conclusion on the strength of a passage in paragraph 6 of the Resolution of Government in the Judicial Department, No. 7969 of the 4th of November 1912. It is there stated that "Magistrates would also do well to scrutinize requests made to compound offences. Permission to do so should only be accorded when a composition is actually offered by the accused and accepted by the complainant." That advice on the part of Government can only apply to cases where the permission of the Court is needed in order that the case may be compounded. It cannot apply to cases where the person injured is entitled of himself to compound the case. The law on the point is clearly enough laid down in section 345 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But the Magistrate, thinking that he must take some action of his own, called on the parties to prove that the case was compounded, and he says that the parties have not even attempted to prove it. This is a part of the Magistrate's judgment in particular which I do not understand. When the parties had of themselves put in a written paper signed by themselves—there is no doubt whatever on these points—and when that paper states that the offence is compounded, then it seems to me that the parties have not only attempted to prove, but have in fact proved that the offence is compounded. That this was so is further demonstrated by what followed when the Magistrate refused to treat the case as compounded and went on to take evidence. The complainant said that she had compounded the case and stated later that the facts alleged in the complaint were not true. That seems to me to be further evidence, if further evidence were needed, that she was determined for her part not to go on with the case against the persons whom she had originally accused. That again is entirely consistent with the view that she had compounded the case. Indeed, how the idea ever entered the Magistrate's mind that the case had not in fact been compounded is another matter which I am unable to understand. It seems to me to be clear beyond any possibility of doubt that the case was compounded in fact. And seeing that it was a case which the complainant could compound without the permission of the Magistrate, it was also compounded in law.

Therefore, the convictions of accused Nos. 2 and 3 in this case must be set aside and the fines, if paid, ordered to be refunded.

The order as to payment of Court-fees made by the trying Magistrate is also set aside.

SHAH, J.—I agree. It is clear in this case that the offences with which the accused were charged by the complainant were compoundable and that they were in fact compounded by the person concerned. There being no doubt whatever about the fact of the offences having been compounded, it is clear that under clause 6 of section 345 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the accused ought to have been acquitted.

Order accordingly.

CHUHAR SINGH—CONVICT—APPELLANT

versus

EMPEROR—PROSECUTOR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (XLV of 1860), s. 300—Murder—Circumstantial evidence · Unsatisfactory evidence of identification of body—Conviction, whether sustainable.

A conviction of murder cannot be sustained where the only circumstantial evidence against the accused is that the deceased was seized by the accused and the husband of the deceased in the road, placed on a camel and carried towards a canal in which her body was afterwards found completely dismembered, specially when the evidence of identification of the body is unsatisfactory and there is no direct evidence connecting the accused with the commission of the crime.

Appeal from the order of the Sessions Judge, Ferozepur Division, at Ferozepur, dated the 11th July 1914, convicting the appellant.

Messrs. Vaughan and Nand Lal, for the Appellant.

The Assistant Legal Remembrancer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Chuhar Singh, appellant, has been convicted of murder and has been sentenced to death. He has appealed and we have also to consider his case under section 374, Criminal Procedure Code, if we support the conviction. However after going very carefully through the evidence and giving due weight to the arguments laid before us on both sides, we have arrived at the conclusion that there is not sufficient legal proof of the guilt of the appellant, who is, therefore, entitled to an acquittal.

The learned Sessions Judge and the assessors alike took a different view and the former has written a painstaking and lucid judgment—so lucid and full that we need not discuss the case at great length. According to the theory of the prosecution Musammat Rupan, wife by Karewa of Khem Singh, was seized by him and the appellant in the road, placed on a camel, which Chuhar Singh had borrowed that day from one Indar Singh, carried towards the canal, murdered and dismembered and thrown into the water. This is said to have happened on 14th January last, the capture taking place some little time before sunset. But then, according to the prosecution evidence (see P. W. No. 18 and P. W. No. 28), Chuhar Singh, appellant, was at Raoke Kalan, his own village, and returned the camel to its owner, at lamp-lighting time, which at that time of the year would certainly be less than an hour after sunset; and here we have the first obstacle in the way of finding that appellant was one of the actual murderers, for judging by the map and the evidence of the trackers, who profess to have detected the route and journeying and halts made, the party must have travelled at least five miles, and to the time necessarily occupied in travelling we must add the time spent in more than one halt and in the actual murder, the complete dismemberment of an adult human body and the carrying of it some distance to the water. It is suggested that P. W. No. 23, who is Indar Singh's servant, may, like his master, have had some motive for representing the early return of the camel and so helping to save appellant, but this argument does not touch the eivdence of Hazara Singh, P. W. No. 18, who seems a respectable lambardar. No doubt we have the direct evidence of Chandu Singh and Mit Singh—P. W. No. 9 and P. W. No. 10—to the abduction, indirectly corroborated by Bhola Singh, P. W. No. 8, but even if that evidence be true, it may only prove appellant's taking part in the carrying off of the woman and is quite compatible with his leaving her with Khem Singh, who it should be noted has not been found, and returning home without joining in the murder, if any. Further, P. W. No. 9 and P. W. No. 10 are not above suspicion, for the latter brings into his statement to the Committing Magistrate Indar Singh as being present and abetting the abduction and then drops this before the Sessions Court. The learned Sessions Judge tries to get over this difficulty by suggesting at the end of his judgment that appellant, knowing questions would be asked if he was late with the camel, hurried back with it immediately after the murder; but considering the distances traversed and all the circumstances, we do not think this really removes the difficulty in the way of the prosecution.

Again, the body supposed to be Musammat Rupan's was found on 22nd January, eight days after the alleged murder, in the water 56 miles down stream from the spot where it is supposed to have been thrown in, and the question arises whether it was Rupan's body at all. The head, arms and legs were not found, but only the trunk, which was entirely naked. The only identificatory mark pointed to by the prosecution is a boil mark on the back of one thigh. A mark was mentioned in the Naksha Surat-i-hal as like mole, the size of an 8-annas piece. The doctor who made the post mortem never noticed this, but later Narain Singh, P. W. No. 5, a former paramour of Musammat Rupan, when asked about this, said he remembered that she had a boil mark. The body was then exhumed and the mark found. This seems to us a somewhat slender foundation for a finding that this was Mussammat Rupan's body; and against the theory of the prosecution is the very important fact that the doctor who did the post mortem expressly says that the skin was fresh-looking. He was, unfortunately, not expressly asked whether the decomposition had set in or whether the body was like that of one killed eight or nine days previously; but when we add that in the Naksha Surat-i-hal in the column, "is it stout, thin or decomposed?", the entry is "stout," with not a word about decomposition, it is fairly clear that it is somewhat improbable that the body found met with its death so early as 14th January.

There is nowhere in the case for the Crown any attempt to connect appellant with a crime committed later than 14th January, and we thus have, first, the doubt as to the identity of the corpse, and, secondly, the probability that it was murdered some days after 14th January, each of which circumstances seem to us, even taken separately, to justify appellant's prayer for absolution. Mr. Herbert strives to meet all this by pointing out that appellant and Khem Singh had a strong motive for getting rid of Musammat Rupan, and referring us to page 42 of the paper-book, where in his judgment the Sessions Judge has summarised the quarrels between the woman and them, and to page 38, and to the deposition of P. W. No. 21. We may say at once that we agree with him here. Then he insists that, in connection with the identity of the body, the finding of the ear-ring by Bhagu and Gajjan near the canal track towards the canal, and the proof that this was one of the ear-rings worn by Musammat Rupan, are the important things. As to this we can go so far as to concede that the woman was probably taken to the spot where the ear-ring was found; but this is all. Next, Mr. Herbert adverts to the evidence that Musammat Rupan was a woman with undeveloped breasts, a peculiarity found in the corpse, that she had a peacock tattooed on one arm, which arm on this very account probably was cut off and disposed of elsewhere, and, lastly, that she was known to have unusual defects in her genital organs which in the corpse were found mutilated and to a great extent removed. We are far from refusing to recognize the force of these arguments and from brushing them aside. They seem to us very much to deepen the suspicion that Musammat Rupan has been done to death; but they in no way remove the difficulties in the way of holding the present appellant guilty of her murder.

Finding ourselves, therefore, unable to hold with any confidence that appellant joined in the alleged murder of Musammat Rupan, we must accept his appeal and acquit him. We order accordingly.

Appeal accepted.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 898), s. 110—Inquiry in progress—Detaining accused in jail—Illegality—General repute, evidence of.

To send a person to jail while an inquiry under security proceedings is in progress, is an illegality which prejudices his interests in the inquiry.

Therefore, such an inquiry can be said neither to be fair nor conducted with that regard for the rights and privileges of the person against whom the proceedings are taken, which the law requires.

Where the Chairman of the Managing Committee of a Municipality was proceeded against under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the proceedings being based on evidence of general repute, and he was detained in jail pending the inquiry:

Held (1) that the fact of detaining him in jail while the inquiry was in progress prejudiced his interests in the trial and rendered the inquiry unfair;

(2) that the evidence of general repute must in this case be evidence of a reputation which the accused had acquired since his appointment to the chairmanship.

Revision application against an order passed by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Ahmednagar, and confirmed in appeal by the District Magistrate of Ahmednagar.

Mr. G. S. Rao, for the Accused.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

HEATON, J.—In this case we set aside the order requiring security from the applicant.

We do this in revision. It is said, and no doubt correctly said, that we seldom interfere in these matters in revision. But the circumstances here are very exceptional. The applicant was sent to jail whilst the inquiry was in progress, an illegal thing and one which, on the face of it, prejudices his interest in the inquiry. Therefore, we cannot but say in this case that the inquiry has not been a fair one. It has not been conducted with that regard for the rights and privileges of the person against whom the proceedings were taken, which our law requires.

On the merits of the case I only want to say one thing. There is evidence of general reputation. It appears, however, that the applicant was Chairman of the Managing Committee of the Municipality of Vambori. Now when he came to be last appointed to that office, it ought to be evident that at that time his general reputation hardly could be that of a receiver of stolen property. And if evidence of general reputation is put forward in a case of this kind it must, so far as general reputation goes, almost inevitably be evidence of a reputation which has been acquired since the last appointment to an office of this kind, and, as such, it can be tested perhaps more easily than is usually the case with the evidence of that type.

For these reasons, I think the order requiring security must be set aside.

SHAH, J.—I agree.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 476—Execution of decree, proceedings in—Judicial proceedings—Jurisdiction of Court.

Proceedings in execution of a decree are 'judicial proceedings' and, therefore, a Court has jurisdiction to pass an order under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, with reference to matters which have come to its knowledge in execution proceedings.

Shaikh Bahadur v. Shaikh Eradatulla Mallick, 6 Ind. Cas. 801; 11 Cr. L. J. 407; 14 C. W. N. 799; 12 C. L. J. 45; 37 C. 642, referred to.

Application against the order of the Munsif, Kunda, dated 1st June 1914.

Mr. I. Masaldan, for the Applicant.

Mr. Ali Muhammad and the Government Pleader, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—Shahamat Khan, applicant, held a decree, dated 20th January 1914, against Gulab Khan, opposite party, for Rs. 177-14. On the 16th of May 1914, Shahamat Khan applied for execution of the decree, and the property of the judgment-debtor was ordered to be attached. Meanwhile on the 9th of May Gulab Khan had applied filing a receipt, dated 28th February 1914, and asking that the decree-holder might be called for to certify its correctness. Notice was issued and on the 30th of May the Munsif went into the question and decided that the receipt was genuine, that the money had been paid and the decree discharged, that the statement of Shahamat Khan in that connection, that he had not received any money nor had signed the receipt, was false, and that his application for execution of decree made on the 16th May, after having received the decretal amount, was deserving of punishment. He committed him for trial under sections 193 and 210 and sent the case under section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code to the District Magistrate, Partabgarh.

Application in revision has been made to this Court on the ground that the learned Munsif had no jurisdiction to pass any such order after the termination of the judicial proceedings. The learned Counsel who argued this application explains that his objection means that, as section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure only has reference to matters which have come to the knowledge of the Court in the course of judicial proceedings, therefore, the Munsif had no jurisdiction to pass an order under that section in this case, proceedings in execution of a decree not being judicial proceedings; and he relied upon a ruling in Kanto Ram Das v. Gobardhan Das (1). Having regard to the definition of 'judicial proceedings' in the Code of Criminal Procedure, there can be no doubt whatever that proceedings in execution of decree are judicial proceedings: and that has recently been held in Shaikh Bahadur v. Shaikh Eradatulla Mallick (2).

The application is rejected.

NGA KYAN AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 250—Charge of bribery—False charge—Compensation—Frivolous or vexatious.

As long as a case is frivolous or vexatious, the fact that it is also false is no bar to the application of section 250, Criminal Procedure Code.

A charge of bribery may not be frivolous, but, if false, is undoubtedly vexatious.

Mr. J. N. Basu, for the Applicant.

Mr. L K. Mitter, for the Respondents.

ORDER.—The applicant presented a complaint charging respondent, Nga Kyan, a Revenue Surveyor, with having taken a bribe of Rs. 100, and respondents, Aung Tha and Thet Le, with having given this bribe to him.

The District Magistrate framed charges against respondent, Nga Kyan, under section 161 and the other two respondents under sections 161 and 114 of the Indian Penal Code, but in the end acquitted all three and directed the applicant to pay Rs. 50 to each of them as compensation under section 250 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

I am asked to interfere in revision, on the ground that the order was illegal because the Magistrate found the applicant's charges to be false and because Rs. 50 is the maximum prescribed by the section. A further objection is also taken on the ground that the Magistrate at the same time made an order to the effect that in default of payment, applicant should undergo simple imprisonment for one month.

The last-mentioned order was, of course, wrong as a perusal of clause (2) of section 250 is sufficient to show, but as the money has been paid, the mistake is immaterial.

As regards the maximum, the learned

Advocate must have misconstrued clause (1) of the section, the language of which is quite plain and free from ambiguity. It authorises a Magistrate to order compensation not exceeding Rs. 50 to be paid to each of the accused where there are more than one.

As regards the first point, the subject was fully considered by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Beni Madhub Kurmi v. Kumud Kumar Biswas (1). Four of the five Judges composing the Bench held that as long as a case is frivolous or vexatious, the fact that it is also false is no bar to the application of section 250. On consideration, I am of opinion that this ruling deserves to be followed. In the present case the charges being of giving and receiving a bribe were not frivolous, but if false, as the Magistrate found, they were undoubtedly vexatious. It is to be noted that section 250 of the present Code speaks of "frivolous or vexatious" accusations and not, as one of the previous Codes had it "frivolous and vexatious."

No objection has been taken in the application to the order of acquittal, and after referring to the proceedings, I am of opinion that no ground has been made out for the interference of this Court in revision with that order.

The application is dismissed.

Murder—Four accused joined in beating of which two only gave fatal blows—Responsibility of other two—Hurt—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 300, 323.

Where four persons joined in beating another, out of them two gave him fatal blows on the head which resulted in his death, while the remaining two struck him on the body with no exceptional violence, and were not shown to have realized that they were taking part in a murder or how grave the injuries inflicted by their comrades were:

Held, that the latter were guilty only of causing simple hurt under section 323, Indian Penal Code.

Appeal from an order of the Sessions Judge, Attock Division, at Campbellpur, dated the 26th October 1913, convicting the appellants.

Mr. Nand Lal, for Mr. Bhagat Ram Puri, for the Appellants.

Mr. Saunders, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—On the evening of 21st August 1913 at Mauza Mirza, one Gauhar Din was killed and Abdullah, Ali Akbar and Musammat Mirzan were hurt, it is said, by the four accused, namely, Nizam Shah, aged 70; Gul Shah, his brother, 50; Akbar Shah, son of Gul Shah, 20; and Hussain Shah, 18, son of Nizam Shah. They have been convicted of the murder of Gauhar Din, and all four have been sentenced to transportation for life, and have put in a joint appeal, which has been argued at some length by Mr. Nand Lal. The conclusion we have arrived at is that all four of them joined in beating Gauhar Din, that Nizam Shah and Gul Shah in doing so committed murder, but that the two younger men merely intended to cause, and did cause, simple hurt. We will now proceed to explain how we have arrived at this conclusion.

In our opinion the following facts are fully proved. In the courtyard of the house of Abdullah aforesaid there was a dog-fight. This led to abuse between him and Nizam Shah. Gul Shah was there with Nizam Shah, and presently Akbar Shah came in. He first struck Abdullah, and then Nizam Shah and Gul Shah struck him (we do not believe that Gul Shah had an axe, as some of the witnesses pretend). The accused were then induced to leave the yard, but outside they first came upon Ali Bahadur, and then upon Gauhar Din, and beat them both separately, disposing of Ali Bahadur first. Nizam Shah and Gul Shah both struck Gauhar Din on the head, and after he fell, Akbar Shah and Hussain Shah joined them in striking him with sticks on the shoulders and back. The injuries to the head were terrible and necessarily fatal causing at least six serious fractures of the skull; but the body injuries were, comparatively speaking, ordinary, not amounting in themselves to grievous hurt. After that some or all of the accused attacked Musammat Mirzan.

Two reports were made at the thana, the first by the accused's party at 9-45 P.M. and the second by complainant's party at 10-15 P. M., each accusing the other of aggression and asserting for themselves the position of victims. This case was tried first, and when conviction was had, the Public Prosecutor withdrew from the other case. The accused here insist that their version of the affair is the real one ; but examination of the evidence shows that the story of the prosecution is substantially true. No doubt some of the accused suffered injuries, that is, Nizam Shah and Gul Shah did, but this, no doubt, occurred in the course of their encounter with Abdullah and Ali Bahadur. As to Gauhar Din, who is an old man of 60 and whom we believe to have been unarmed, there is every reason to suppose that there was no fight in the proper sense of the word: in short, we think, the accused fell upon him and knocked him about simply because he was who he was and because he remonstrated with Nizam Shah.

Mr. Nand Lal complains that the witnesses for the Crown are not disinterested, and it is true that most of them are either persons injured by the accused or interested in the prosecution party ; but at least Nawab and Mustakim, P. W. No. 11 and P. W. No. 12, are independent witnesses, and others would naturally be on the spot. In such quarrels it is extremely difficult to get persons unconnected with either party to come forward, and the Courts must come to conclusions on such evidence as may be available. If that evidence accords well with the general circumstances and with the medical evidence, it cannot be rejected merely because it is to some extent merely the testimony of partisans. We have carefully perused the depositions of Abdullah, P. W. No. 3, who was himself beaten and who saw the latter part of the beating of Gauhar Din; of Kiman, his son, P. W. No. 4, who saw the occurrences in the yard; of Rahman-ud-Din, P. W. No. 5, who saw all the assaults; of Wazir, P. W. No. 6, who saw the attacks on Ali Bahadur and Gauhar Din; of Musammat Mirzan of Kala; P. W. No. 7, who saw much the same of Ali Bahadur, P. W. No. 8, who testifies to his own beating but saw no more as he became senseless; of Hussain (a boy of 12), P. W. No. 9, who saw Ali Bahadur and Gauhar Din knocked down; of Musammat Mirzan, P. W. No. 10, who saw the whole affair; of Nawab and Mustakim (P. W. Nos. 11 and 12), who only saw Gauhar Din beaten. Though Kariman is son of Abdullah; though Rahman-ud-Din is related to Wazir, who is son-in-law of the murdered man; though Kala is occupancy-tenant under Abdullah; though Ali Bahadur is own brother of Abdullah and of the deceased; though the boy Hussain is Abdulla's son; though Musammat Mirzan is wife of Ali Bahadur—we are convinced that the tales they tell, which agree with the general circumstances and with the medical evidence, are substantially true; and we think that the defence theory of a violent attack by a large number of persons of the opposite party on Nizam Shah and Gul Shah, the younger men Akbar Shah and Hussain Shah not being present at all, is discredited, both because it is highly improbable, as it does not account for injuries to Abdulla, Ali Bahadur and Musammat Mirzan, not to speak of Gauhar Din, and because it is wholly unsupported by evidence. We wish especially to note the valuable evidence of Rahman-ud-Din, P. W. No. 5, who is a Havildar in a regiment, and whose evidence, by its ring of truth and its avoidance of exaggeration in details, deserves every credit.

It remains only to explain that we distinguished the guilt of Nizam Shah and Gul Shah on the one hand from that of Akbar Shah and Hussain Shah in this way. The matter in hand is the attack on Gauhar Din. All the witnesses are agreed that only the two older accused struck him on the head and those blows caused his death. The two younger men struck him on the body, not with exceptional violence. There was no original design to kill Gauhar Din, and we think very likely the younger accused, who did not themselves strike fatal blows, did not realize that they were joining in a murder or how grave the injuries inflicted by their older comrades were. The latter must certainly be taken to have intended to cause such bodily injury as was to their knowledge likely to cause death, and no "exception" to section 300 applies.

We, therefore, reject the appeal of Nizam Shah and Gul Shah, but accept that of Akbar Shah and Hussain Shah, altering their conviction to section 323, Indian Penal Code, and their sentences to one year's rigorous imprisonment in each case.

Appeal partly accepted.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 84—Unsoundness of mind—Mental derangement falling short of unsoundness—Murder—Lesser penalty—Youth ordinarily extenuating circumstance.

The law requires that a man shall be held responsible for his acts although he may be suffering from mental derangement in cases where that mental derangement falls short of the unsoundness of mind described in section 84 of the Penal Code.

On proof of such mental derangement in a murderer, the lesser sentence may be passed.

Ordinarily youth is itself an extenuating circumstance, but it does not mean that in every case of murder, where the accused is under a certain age, the lesser penalty must be awarded.

Mr. J. N. Basu, for the Appellant.

Mr. H. M. Lutter, Government Prosecutor, for the Crown.

ORDER.—Appellant, Kan Hla, 17, has been convicted under section 302 of the Indian Penal Code, and sentenced by the Sessions Court of Sagaing to death for the murder of Mi Kan Shi, a girl of 15, his betrothed, on the 23rd June last at Myintagyi.

The facts really admit of no doubt. There was an eye witness, Mi Tha Mi, a woman of 36, who was on a tama tree plucking leaves between 300 and 400 yards from the spot, and saw appellant striking the deceased two or three times with some weapon and saw the deceased fall. She swears that she was under no sort of doubt as to the identity of the appellant, and she immediately went to the village and gave information as well as telling people she met on the way.

Appellant was at once searched for, and found at the house of his natural father at Tetkaung. (He lived ordinarily with his adoptive father at Myintagyi). On being arrested by the headman, he confessed to him that he had killed the deceased. On the next day, the 24th June, at Yeu, appellant made a full confession to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate which was recorded after the prescribed preliminary inquiry. This preliminary inquiry was not as full or intelligent as it might and ought to have been, but it was sufficient to make the confession admissible.

In the Sessions Court, appellant alleged that he confessed because he was threatened by the Sub-Inspector of Police, Po Hla, and Constable Tha Kun. The Sessions Judge inquired into this allegation and came to the conclusion that it was unfounded and that the confession was voluntary. In this finding I concur.

The appellant in his confession said that he quarrelled with the deceased because she would not go with him to open some water channels and wished that a viper might bite him; that this enraged him so much that he went to the village (1,100 odd yards distant) and got a dama with which he proceeded to kill the deceased, and that he "did not know what happened to his mind." He delivered several cuts on deceased, one of which severed the head from the body all but a bit of skin, and another penetrated the abdomen and pierced the liver. There can be no doubt that the offence falls within section 300, and unless any exception general or special applies, amounts to murder punishable under section 302, Indian Penal Code.

The Sessions Judge referred to Nga Tha Kin v. Emperor (1) and, as I understand his remarks, came to the conclusion that in spite of appellant's age the circumstances of the case were such that he ought to be hanged. He was of opinion that there was no indication whatever of mental unsoundness, that appellant was well developed and normal physically and mentally, and should be held fully responsible.

It is argued on his behalf before me that appellant's story of going to the village for the dama is extremely improbable, on the supposition that appellant was in a normal condition of mind, and was probably untrue, and that if it was true, it argues a serious derangement of mind, the motive for appellant's anger being so trivial and inadequate that if he was a person of really sound mind, he could not have gone all the way to the village and back without cooling down. It is suggested, therefore, that either appellant made use of a weapon which was ready to his hand on the spot and acted without premeditation and on the spur of the moment in the heat of passion, or else, if he went to the village for the dama, he was the victim of homicidal mania. Reference is made to Lyon's Medical Jurisprudence, 3rd Edition, page 350 seqq., where symptoms of homicidal mania are enumerated, absence of motive, absence of any attempt at concealment, absence of accomplices, absence of elaborate preparation, etc., etc., and where cases are given of homicidal mania in which there had been no previous manifestation of mental derangement.

In brief, it is not contended that any of the special exceptions applied, and the only general exception touched upon is that contained in section 84, Indian Penal Code.

With regard to appellant's age, the effect of the decision in Tha Kin's case (1) above cited was to explain that ordinarily youth is itself an extenuating circumstance. I do not think that there is any room for misapprehension on this point. At the same time the ruling was not intended to lay down, and it did not lay down, that in every case of murder where the accused is under a certain age, the lesser penalty must be awarded. I am not, therefore, disposed to hold that the learned Sessions Judge was wrong in the view which he took that the appellant's age was not a sufficient ground for exempting him from the death penalty.

But the question of mental unsoundness remains. Here I think that the contentions of the learned Advocate are not without support. There seems to be no reason to doubt the correctness of appellant's statement that he went to the village for the dama. But the case is somewhat similar to the English cases mentioned by Taylor in his Medical Jurisprudence (6th Edition, Volume I, page 878,) and referred to in Queen-Empress v. Lakshman Dagdu (2), where there was practically nothing to show that the accused was insane except the nature of the crime and the manner in which it was committed. But as pointed out in Lakshman Dagdu's case (2), the question of appellant's responsibility must be decided according to the test prescribed in section 84 of the Indian Penal Code. As I understand it, the law requires that a man shall be held responsible for his acts, although he may be suffering from mental derangement, in cases where that mental derangement falls short of the unsoundness of mind described in the section. As far as one can judge, the appellant was not incapable of knowing the nature of his act or that it was wrong or contrary to law. He made himself scarce and he did not tell any one what he had done until he was arrested. He then related what he had done and gave explanations. There have been one or two cases in this Court in which the same question arose. The last one which I have traced was in many respects a close counterpart of the present. This was Nga Tin v. Empreor, unreported Criminal Application No. 170 of 1909, decided on November 16th, 1909. There the accused, one Nga Tin, aged 17, was convicted and sentenced to death for the murder of his wife, Mi Mi. The facts admitted of no doubt. The accused without any apparent reason whatever suddenly picked up a dama and cut his wife with it several times. One cut falling on the throat severed the carotid artery and so caused instant death. The next day the accused made a full confession to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate in which he said that he "did not know what became of his mind" and that he cut his wife "because his mind had gone astray." According to the evidence, the accused had never exhibited any signs of insanity at any time. I held that there was no ground for ordering further inquiry into the accused's mental condition, and that he was not entitled to be acquitted, but that the case was one where the lesser sentence was sufficient to meet the ends of justice, following in this respect the view taken in Queen-Empress v. Lakshman Dagdu(2) already cited and also the later Madras case of Queen-Empress v. Venkatasami (3). It appears to me that the present case calls for a similar finding.

The appellant's conduct suggests that there was present a certain degree of mental unsoundness, although it was not sufficient to bring him within section 84 of the Indian Penal Code, and on this ground I am of opinion that the lesser sentence should be passed, apart from the question of his age.

Conviction altered.
